There was once upon a time a certain philosopher who, by the mere exercise of his will, could die whenever he pleased; could put himself into a state of trance, during which his soul, like all living souls, retained his own individuality, but wandered at large into infinite space and infinite time, where there are no special conditions of life and energy; where there are no parts or atoms, but all things are merged in one vast whole. We realize much the same kind of sensations whenever we enter the great city of all great cities.

In every other place we live. Every other spot of earth has an individuality of its own; and when we are in any other spot than this, we also have ours, consciously felt by ourselves and recognished. CHAPTER IV.

of its own; and when we are in any other spot than this, we also have ours, consciously felt by ourselves and recognized by those about us. Every other place is a place of traffic, of pleasure, of history, of study, of torpor, or of some one of a hundred other things, as the case may be; and every inhabitant of it is more or less in keeping with its characteristic quality in an understood and appreciated degree—in a word, can feel himself, and feel and be feit by others so as to have a separate existence from the mass. But London has, of all places in the world, the power of absorbing existences, and of merging them in its own. It is more a city of pleasure even than Paris; more of traffic than New York; more of history than Rome; more of study than Oxford; more of torpor than Denethorp. And it is all this, and the opposite of all this, and a great deal else besides, at one and the same time. No one can possibly feel his great deal else besides, at one and the same time. No one can possibly feel his own individual existence. On entering the universal city he is lost in the whole, like a rain-drop in the sea; like the soul of Hermotimus in the soul of the universe itself.

Doubtless it is a glorious sensation. even though it may considerably diminish our self-conceit, to quit the small for the great; to exchange our own narrow bodies for the vast body of humanity itself. But it is not quite so glarious a self. But it is not quite so giarious a sensation when this vast body, as multiform in its aspects as Proteus himself, chooses to assume to us its most evil guise; when it wears the aspect of inguise; when it wears the aspect of in-finite hunger and of infinite cold. Then a man would fain still farther imitate the philosopher in question by recovering once more his separate, his individual a man would fain still farther imitate the philosopher in question by recovering once more his separate, his individual life, however narrow and confined it might be, and however miserable; for it is better to feel, if starve one must, that one at least starves as a man, and not as a mere atom of a vast starving machine. It need scarcely be said that Felix was not among those to whom a return to his old life was possible. He had chosen to follow his fate to London, and now he must drain whatever cup he might find there, whether of gold or of gall, and whether he chose or no.

Certainly luck had so far been against him, for his present position could not be called altogether the result of imprudence. Had the theater not been burned, he, with his few wants and solitary manner of existence, could have lived on as well, in a pecuniary sense, as he had lived in Paris, and have dreamed of future fame; and thought of Angelique as well here as there. As time went on, too, his position would doubtless have improved, for he was really a skillful and promising musician; and if merit seldom "succeeds" by its own force, it seldom "succeeds" by its own force, it seldom altogether fails. But now he was, omising musician; and if merit sel-m "succeeds" by its own force, it sel-m altogether fails. But now he was, the destruction of the house at which was engaged, entirely thrown out of work; for engagements are by no means so plentiful as those who require themat least, they were not so in those days, whatever the case may be now. Besides, whatever the case may be now. Besides, he had, of course, long since spent the small sum of money that he had brought with him from Paris. He had saved nothing; he had lost his violin, and he had made no friends who could be of any assistance to him.

Of course, there were many worse off these he was not hurdened with a than he. He was not burdened with a wife and a dozen children; he was not infeeble health; he was not seventy years old. Surely, he thought to himself that night, as hundreds and thousands of young, healthy and unburdened men have thought before him, there must be some way of getting a living, even if in order to do so he should have to desert his profession for a while; and before he fell asleep, as he did, and soundly, he had come to grieve for his violin, not as for a good instrument, but as for a dear friend; for its own sake, that is, far more than for the daily bread which which it represented. None but the artist can tell how dear to the heart-that mysterious thing called a musical instrument may be which use and association have endowed with what seems like sympathetic life; with a soul made up of all the fancies and all the passions and all the thoughts with which its strings have trembled since it first was made to speak. But there is consolation in thinking that a not inglorious death has saved what we love from danger of desecration;

a not inglorious death has saved what we love from danger of desecration; whatever might prove to be the fate of the master, the soul which his hands had made was safe among the stars. And, now that he was put to it, and with this thought for a consolation, after all, he came to think also, there are many worse hindrances in the way of winning the world's battle than that of having nothing to lose. Must not the man inevitably conquer who has to choose between victory and death? With Angelique true to him, what would he not of? Love and the instinct of self-preservation—the poetry and the prose preservation—the poetry and the prose of life—came to his aid, and filled him with the full courage which is the last thing that a man should lose. Nor did thing that a man should lose. Not ut the morning bring about a reaction. But, alas! courage, youth, health and independence are not talismans. Even they united cannot without external aid obtain employment at a day's notice; nor, very often, for a great many days. And then Felix had disadvantages. He could scarcely speak English, and he had lost the only instrument that he knew how to handle. And so, after three or four days of ineffectual search and exertion, he began to feel his courage ooze away with his physical strength. Love away with his physical strength. Love and fame, indeed! He was fast reach-ing a condition in which he would forfeit the highest throne in the palace of art, ing a condition in which he would forfeit the highest throne in the palace of art, and Angelique to boot, for bread, and yet be neither the worse artist nor the worse lover. "Omnia vincit amor," say the poets; but they are wrong, as those who have known what the word hunger really means know well. Omnia vincit fames, they should say: only it would not be pretty—and, besides, it would not sean.

After all to say this is not to prove

After all, to say this is not to prove After all, to say this is not to prove so guilty of treason to romance as might at first be thought. In these days love has ceased to hold a monopoly of romantic material. Poverty competes with it on terms which, to say the least of it, are fully equal; even as the story which the winter feest has to tell which before are fully edual; even as the story which brings no tears indeed, but fills the heart with barren desplation, is to the full as effective as the song of a spring flower. Hunger, as the handmaid of poverty, has a romance of its own—and a terrible one, [To be Continued.]

While stationed at Orange River Station, I was suffering from a very bad throat, and unable to take any solid food for about three days. On retiring to rest at night I used to put my socks around my neck in order to obtain relief. It suddenly dawned upon me that I had in my haversack a small pot of Kelpion, and this I took out and saw on the label "Swollen glands." I applied the ointment immediately, rubbing it well in for about 20 minutes. I then retired to rest and was able to get up next morning and do full justice to a good breakfast. The lightning results were beyond my com-

HOCKEY.

GERMANS DEFEAT TECUMSEHS. London lost the match in Berlin last night by a score of 10 to 2. The London team seemed unable to cope with the Germans on their own ice. The score at the end of the first half was 6 to 1, and when time was called the score stood 10 to 2 against London. The meager dimensions of the Berlin rink, which is not one half the width of the Jubilee Rink, and is also much shorter, prevented the London team from doing justice to themselves. It was only once in a while that London was able to carry the puck into Berlin's territory.

Bishop played the star game for London, his work marking him as the best goal tender in the W. O. H. A. The lack of room in the rink prevented the Londons from using any of their combination work, in which they are practically perfect, and the play almost entirely around the Tecumsehs' Shot after shot was thrown upon young Bishop, and it is a marvel that he kept the score down in the way he did. The whole work of the night was thrown upon London's defense. Under the circumstances, a lift from cover point was as liable to score as a hard shot from a forward close on goal, and this proved London's undo-

ng. Following was the line-up: London-Goal, Bishop; point, West; cover point, Kerrigan; forwards, Mc-Mahon, Lawlor, Douse and Cribb. Berlin-Goal, Cutten: point, Boehmer; cover point, Charlton; forwards, Stephens, Cochrane, Seibert, Schmidt. The special train which carried about 150 London "rooters" to Berlin was very late in arriving. A bugle band accompanied the London team, and paraded around the ice, playing popuar airs before the game started. Mr. Doherty, of the Guelph Agricultural College, made a very impartial referee. His decisions gave satisfaction to both parties. About 200 Waterloo enthusiasts were present and added their rectors to put up a structure that will be modern in every detail and absolutely fireproof. PRINCE HENRY'S TRIP

He Will Journey Over the New York Central Lines, Through the Great Centers of Pop-During a Portion of His Visit to the States.

In his trip through this country, Prince Henry of Prussia will have a great opportunity to study American railroads, and the leading companies have been anxious to show the Ayal visitor their rolling stock and roadbed. That the reputation of the New York Central lines is not only national, but international, is evidenced by the selection of the standard roads in pre paring the itinerary for Prince Henry's tour. An officer, high in diplomatic circles, who is an admirer of American methods, after looking over the schedules, cogently remarked to his colleague, that the New York Central had evidently arranged to present the science of railroading to Prince Henry in its highest development.

The following is the schedule over the New York Central lines: On Wednesday, March 5, at 12:30 a.m., the Royal Special will leave Chi-cago for Niagara Falls, via the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad arriving in Buffalo at 2:45 p.m. (stop fifteen minutes). Leave Buffalo at 3 p.m., via New York Central, arrive at Niagara Falls 3:45 p.m.; 2 hours and 15 minutes at Ningara Falls, train to be conveniently located during stay; leave Niagara Falls 6 p.m., via New York Central, arrive at Rochester 8:15 p.m. (stop twenty minutes); leave Rochester 8:35 p.m., arrive Syracuse 10:25 p.m. (stop ten minutes); leave Syracuse 10:35 p.m., arrive Albany about 2 a.m. Thursday.

On Thursday, March 6, the Royal Special will arrive at Boston at 10 a.m., via Boston and Albany railroad; day and evening in Boston. (Train to be conveniently located during stay). Friday, March 7, via Boston and Al-
