situations. We have the NEED Program and job sharing programs in place, Mr. Speaker, which is part of the short-term solution and part of the bridge to better economic times. They are working but, unfortunately, there are those in society who say: "Wait a minute; I want more money to go into this area to create more jobs. I do not want to share my job ten years from now." We have that kind of thinking to deal with.

I would like to sum up the afternoon's debate by saying it must make the Bishops, and all of us in the country, feel very good to know we can have this kind of dialogue and that it is successful, because the main point of the Bishops' statement was to place on the table for Canadians the opportunity to take a look through fresh eyes at the dilemma we find ourselves in today in this country and around the world. Hopefully, through dialogue, understanding and above all goodwill and honest effort by all of us in society, we will find not only solutions but will set a trend which will carry us into the future with confidence and perhaps help us to evolve into a new society which will serve Canada well.
