nection with the largest possible measure of dominion autonomy. Some of these even would not dread the declaration of Irish independence, provided that the sort of influence that emanates from Berlin can be prevented from interfering with the order and good government of the empire. After good government of the empire. After all, they say, Ireland was independent under Grattan's parliament. Independence, they say, is perfectly consistent with the development of the closest alliance between Ireland and Great Britain. Cnce remove the causes of Irish irritation, or what are believed to be the causes of irritation, from the relations of the two countries, and their interests will be so obviously identical that whatever happy relations obtain as between Britain and Canada and Britain and Australia will be bound to flourish as between Great Britain and Ireland.

Cantain Shawe Taylor, a very shrewd and far-seeing leader in the Irish devolution movement, used to say that the trouble in Ireland came from the centuries-long attempt to make bad Englishmen out of good Irishmen. Anyming that can give the relations between the two countries a chance to become as good-willing as they are between other parts of the British emvire, is to be thankfully received,
