

THE ARNCIFFE PUZZLE, BY GORDON HOLMES

Author of "A MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE."

Lester promptly tucked his nervous hand tightly under his arm. There was nothing of familiarity or presumption in his action. It was, in its inception, the pure protective instinct of the strong man, as free from any thought of friendship as Edith's own involuntary movement.

Presently, indeed, he began to feel a magnetic glow from the hand. He was filled with a vague desire to say something, but he was not sure of his own words. He was not sure of his own words. He was not sure of his own words.

"I am very stupid to give way in this fashion," she faltered at last. "But it has been such a trying day, and people say you must not notice all the vulgarities of a woman's dress. I am not sure of my own words. I am not sure of my own words."

"My dear Miss Holt," protested Lester, "you must not notice all the vulgarities of a woman's dress. I am not sure of my own words. I am not sure of my own words."

"There is one thing I must think of, of course, Dr. Lester," Edith suddenly regained possession of her hand. "The appearance of Lord Arncliffe's nephew will make a great difference to me."

"But why?"

"Oh, you see," she cried, almost pathetically, "I dare not keep all this money when I know that Lord Arncliffe would have given it to his nephew if he had lived long enough to meet him."

"Well," admitted Lester, "I suppose the meeting might have brought about some change in the bequest; but, under the circumstances—"

"I shall hand over the estate to Mr. Bradshaw," said Edith, with determination. "I want you to believe this, because I would not have you think me capable of setting dishonorably."

"You may count on my implicit belief," he exclaimed so earnestly that she gave eyes full in confusion. "Of course," he added hurriedly, "you are right, in a way, but, from the little I have seen of him, Bradshaw does not impress me as a man to take anything he is not legally entitled to. In any case, it is quite evident that Lord Arncliffe would have made handsome provision for you."

"That is another matter," rejoined Edith. "But the real fortune must go to Mr. Bradshaw. I shall never accept it. I am coming to think really, I shall be happy without such a great responsibility."

Lester, extremely so self-conscious, began to feel a delicious tremor of anxiety. He had regarded Edith's wealth as offering an insuperable barrier to his own. Although not so foolish as to prefer a dowdier maid to one who brought an income which should preserve her from want in the event of his death, he never contemplated marrying an heiress, a woman who would rank with the town really wealthy people in the land. Lord Arncliffe's millions opened up infinite vistas.

"Perhaps you are right," he said quietly, though his heart went pit-a-pat in the most unprofessional way. "After all, a lot of money must be a nuisance. Now, about fifteen hundred a year—"

"Yes!"

"I made fifteen hundred last year, but I shall do better next. And—and—"

He had managed to take her hand again, and with it seemed to go all the troubles which harassed her so sorely. He was big and strong and trustworthy—"Yes," she whispered softly.

But Edith's face was not contented to end that night on the terrace. A door opened. They heard Mr. Angier's voice.

"Oh! there you are, Miss Edith! Come here and converse our American cousin. He says that most of the evening he has put on the equipment. Really, he is terrific!"

CHAPTER IX.

HARRY WARREN SUPPLIES A FRESH SENSATION.

The shadow was lengthening, and the first suggestions of evening's heat were softening the vivid hues of the summer landscape, as Harry Warren strode through the Arncliffe grounds on the day following Bradshaw's arrival. There was a hint of untidiness in his gait. His face was deeply flushed. The sagged misery in his eye was of that indelible type which may be dulled, but cannot be drowned, by potations. He was talking his troubles like a child, blaming himself for his own folly, and almost ready to weep at the monstrous injustice of it all. He was indeed a child, an overgrown goody, absolutely deficient in self-control, and ready to gratify any passing fancy without a thought for the day of reckoning.

And now, when that most unpleasant book. This, however, Warren noted with the quick appreciation of nerves at full tension, was as yet unopened. How long would it remain unopened?

And then there came to him an insane desire to scream out—to do anything that might end it all, and drive the expenses that were making an inferno of his life—out he quivered the mocking bend of conceit and stooped lightly up to the French windows which gave access to the library from the garden.

He turned the knob softly. Even now he had not decided on any course of action, though he had some vague hope of engaging the lawyer's attention, perhaps till dinner time, when the book might be left unguarded. So he advanced across the soft carpet, trying to frame a greeting with his dry lips.

The old man's back was toward him, absorbed in his work, and he did not look up, because, as it chanced, he thought the newcomer was a servant.

He turned the knob softly.
