THE POET'S MESSAGE

(J. Lewis Milligan in Toronto Globe.)

The Bliss Carman benefit night in Convocation Hall, at which Siegfried Sassoon, the English poet, was the chief attraction, proved a fair success as a social occasion, but it was not immensely successful as an immediate benefit to our greatest Canadian lyrical poet, who has fallen into physical decline. Poets are proverbially improvident, and, as Mr. McArthur put it, Mr. Carman lacked the "money clutch." The proceeds of the present movement would indicate that his deficiency in this respect still haunts him in his hour of need.

G. C. T. Pemberton of the Bank of Commerce, Toronto, who is acting as treasurer for the benefit fund, does not expect to realize more than $600 as a result of the benefit night.

Canadians have not gained a reputation as a nation of dreamers; they may have their dreams, but these are only of value in so far as they can be realized in hard products and profits. Had Carman come west instead of going south he might have dropped his dreams for solid real estate or politics—who knows? At any rate, he seems to have been unaffected by the feverish and restless reaching after material gains that possesses many of his fellow-countrymen.

Carman's poetry is a combination of the subjective and the objective. He looks with equal penetration both into his own soul and into the soul of nature. There is a diction that no great poet was ever personal, but this would rule out Dante, and even Shakespeare himself. Carman is nothing if not personal. His own personality and personal reflections and emotions inspire his best work.

The riddles of the inner and the outer universes were the subject of his earliest musings, and he has pursued the quest faithfully.

Bliss Carman has lived most of his life apart from the rush and fret of things, but he has had his fingers on the pulses of the world. He estimated his life best and in its ultimate value when he sang:

"The eternal slaves of beauty Are the masters of the world."

In estimating their national assets, Canadians must not concentrate too much upon the material and the practical. The value of whatever material we possess as a nation and a people depends entirely upon the kind of people we are. If we neglect our dreamers, we shall soon be dreamless; without idealists we can have no ideal.
