

Burrill a handsome man; and if one had a fancy for a round head, with depres-sions where bumps are desirable, and vice verse, and an animal sort of attra tiveness of feature, consisting of a low flat forehead. straight none laws for twoness of feature, consisting of a low, flat forehead, straight nose, large, full red lipped mouth, fair florid complexion set off by a pair of dark blue eyes, that were devoid of any kindly expression, and hair, full beard, and moustache, of a reddish brown hue, coarse in quality, but plentiful in quantity, and curling closely; then we will admit that John Burrill was handsome. Why not? We can see handsome bavines at any fat cattle show. After this elation; came the fourth

After this elation; came the fourth stage; a mixture of liquors as the even-ing advanced, and then John Burrill be-came jealous of his rights, careful of his dignity, orafiy, quarrelsome, and difficult to manage. Next he became uproarious, then maudlin; then blind, beastly drunk, and utterly regardless where he laid him down, to finish the night, for his last stage usually dragged itself far into the small hours. Gluthonous and meditative in the Gluttonous and meditative in the morning; beginning to swell with a growing sense of importance about mid-day; amorous, obstrusive, and conse-quential later; hilarious after dinner; quarteleants later, interious after dinner; guarteleants before tea; and down in the ditch before dawn. This was Burrill's notion of enjoying life in leisurely, gen-tlemanly fashion. And this was his daily routine, with variations to suit the oc-

But sober or drunk, morning, noon, night, he never ceased to remind the La-mottes that he was one of them, their equal; never forgot his purpose, or allowed them to forget it, or him. He was their old man of the sea, their bilghts, their cusse, and, they could never hope to abake bim off to shake him off.

CHAPTER XVI.

Sybil sat alone in her boudoir. It was yet early in the evening, but, feeling little inclined to remain in the society of her family, who assembled, with all due family, who assembled, with all due formality, in the drawing room on "at home" evenings, and most of their even ings were spent at home now, she had withdrawn, pleading fatigue after their

The night outside was balmy enough but sybil had ordered a light fire in the grate, and she sat before it with all the rays from a fully illuimnated chandelier falling directly over her

She still wore the rich dress she had put on for her drive; and excitement exercise, something, had lent an unusual glow to her cheeks, and caused her dusky gres to shine clear and steady, almost too clear, too steadfast, was their gaze as it was fixed upon the glowing coals; she had not looked so thoughtul, so self-for-getful, yet self-absorbed, since she came to Mapleton, John Burrill's wife. Sitting thus, she heard a shambling step in the hall, and the heavy voice of her husband, trolling out a snatch of song, caught up most likely in some bar-

He was approaching her door, and quick as thought she sprang from her chair, and noiselessly examined the fastenings, to assure herself against him. Then, while her hand still rested on the door, his hand struck a huge blow upon the outside, and he called out grufily:-"Sybil."

But Mr. Burrill had no notion of being thus appeased; instead of spiking a gut Jasper Lamotte had opened a battery. "I'm delighted to hear that Mrs. Bur-rill has stopped morping." he said gruffly. "but I'll be hanged if I'm glad to hear myself left out of all the programmer, and I'll be cussed if I'm going to put up with it, either," and Mr. Burrill, being full in more senses than one appeared No answer; she dared not move, lest the rustle of her silks should betray her. "S.Sybil, I say, lemme in.". Still no re-ply, and John Burrill shook the door ply, and John Burrill shook the door violently, and ground out an oath. Just then came the sound of another door further up the hall, her mother's door. It opened easily, and closed softly, and then quick, cat-like steps approached, and the voice of Jasper Lamotte, low and serene as usual, arrested the noise of the baffled applicant for admittance. "Less noise, Burrill." Sybil had not heard her father address him in that tone of familiar command. "Sybil's not there."

"Jes zif I didn't know better."

"Nonsense, man; your wife is below with her mother at this moment. Now stop that fuss, and shake yourself out. I've some private words for your ear."

disconcerted. "I've got something to say about my wife," went on Mr. Burrill, "and I'm blessed if I don't say it." What had come over Sybil? Heretofore she would in any way, in every way, have avoided an encounter with him; she would have quitted the field or have re-mained as deaf as a post; but now, "Say it, then, Mr. Burrill, say it, by all means, here and now," she retorted in "We some private words for your ear." "Oh;" the man's voice dropped a tone owar; "quite a time since we've 'ad hany private words. 'Bout Sybil?" "No, sir." The tone was lower than effore, and so stern that it caused the istener to start. "It's about your busi-tees and mine."

The always did after a debauch, and he, be always did after a debauch, and he, if a second distribution of the distribution of the she was about to astonish, more than the had already done, every one of her lis-teners, "that it would be a fine morning for a canter; that is, if to-morrow should be a counterpart of to-day, and I am hungry to be in the saddle." Frank roused himself from his lazy position, and looked interested. He tok a secret delight in annoying Burrill, when he could do it without too much openness or display malice prepense; and here was one of his opportunities. "Well, Sybil, you shan't be hungering in vain," he replied, gallantly. "Name your hour, and your steed, and I will even sacrifice my last best morning nap, if need be." "Well hays a moderately seasonable A little later, and, from his post at his front window, screened by the flowing curtains, Evan saw the horses led around, saw Sybil come down the steps in her trailing, dark cloth habit, saw her spring lightly to the saddle, and heard a mocking laugh ring out, in response to some sally from Frank, as they cantered away if need be." Sybil laughed lightly. "We will have a moderately seasonable breakfast, Frank, not to make your suc-rifice too great; and I will ride Gretchen. Poor thing! she will have almost foraway. "Act one in the insurrection,"

Poor thing! she will have almost for gotten me now."
"Then that is settled," replied Frank, tranquilly, and glancing furtively toward tranquilly, and glancing furtively toward tranquilly, and glancing furtively toward to see some of con.'s new dresses. You can ride into town and call for me later"
"Ahl' very nice arrangement; then I can't call with you?"
"Decidedly not, sir. Who wants a man always about? They are conveniences, not blessings."
"Oh, well, I'm extinguished. 1 promise to vanish from your gan as soon as you are within the gates of the Princess of Wardour, and now I think, after so much vocal effort, and so much solf humiliation, I will go and smoke. Adleu, sister mine; adleu mamma. Will you smoke, Burrill?"
"No, sir, thank you;" replied Burrill, with brief courtesy, and Frank, would his answer would his wardrobe do service before.

with brief courtesy, and Frank, who knew beforehand what his answer would trivance, on the inside; for Evan had knew beforenand what his answe, works be, went toward his own room, smiling contentedly. He had began to grow restless in hi hiding-place, and fiercely disgusted with the sleeper's monotonously musical whis-tle, when his waiting was rewarded. The "Mamma, you were saying something about going to the city yesterday; have you decided about t?" Mrs. Lamotte who had had no thought door once again opened cautiously, and this time, Jasper Lamotte entered. He looked carefully about him, then closing of going to the city, and who was fully conscious that she had made no remarks on the subject, looked up without a ruffle upon her placid countenance and replied, like a wise and good mother. and locking the door, he approached the "I knew it," thought Evan; "the fox will catch the wolf napping, and nail him before he can fortify himself with a 'No, my child, I have not decided.' "No, my child, I have not decided." "Then, when you decide to go, inform me beforehand, mamma. I think I should like to accompany you and do some shopping for myself." Here Burrill showed such market symptoms of outbreak that Mr. Lamotte who, throughout the hour they had passed in the drawing room, had been a uniet but close observer thought it wis morning dram.
