

but who were manly enough to go out with the rest of the people when they decided to go out. Those men are walking the streets of the city of Montreal today. The manufacturers say "Well, we will put them back to work when we need them." That is all very well, but they have placed other men in to do the work that those men were doing before they went out. Now, if they have work for the other men, doing the same thing, why do they not give the old employees a chance, when they have the work to do? We have been begging to get those people back to work but cannot. The Company pretends that they will send for them and give them places when they need them, but, in the meantime they have put other men in their places, at the same work. Why do they not give it to the men who were doing it before?

The only crime those men can have committed is that of, perhaps being the leaders of the Union, or prominent in the union

Q You think you have strong reasons to believe that the company did all it could to divide the workers amongst themselves?

A I will show you how the thing is done--A man who belongs to the Union cannot be a leader in the Union and work in the mills.

In Magog they have to go and see that man and pay their dues, in order to get their jobs back.

Q By "that man" you mean Mr Gignac?

A Yes

Q And, you think that by dividing the workers among
