Official Moving Picture Films.

It is understood that the French government have permitted a wellknown cinematographic company to take films of various battles, on condition that they are not released until authorized by he authorities, which will be long after the war is over. my informant says it was decided to have these films taken not so much for the edification of the public as to furnish a record which may be useful subsequently to the French War Office.

The ordinary cinematograph operator has been placed in a hopeless position by the restrictions enforced upon him. An English company sent out ten operators, and provided them with three motor cars. The French army authorities seized the motor cars for their own purposes saying they would be restored after the war, and the English authorities have charge of the amount of the common than the charge of the have charge of the cameras, so that no harm should befall them:
