At last he reached his hotel; and flung himself on his bed, prayerless, friendless, and only saved from despair by the thought of an affection that was deeper than his, which he, as a man and a faithful friend, should be strong to relieve and comfort.

These details were not noticed by Will Sheridan as he entered the echoing arch-way; but he was chilled, nevertheless, by the cold shadow of the surroundings. The warden with him came to the wicket, and took the letter, leaving Will outside. In a few minutes, he found that his introduction was an "open scame."

With his eyes fixed on a ponderous door, which he did not see, Will Sheridan made a sudden and impetuous resolution. "I shall return to Australia on this convict ship," were the words that he now heard but his own soul.
