I wish I knew that child's parents," he said to a friend near by.

"Why, doctor, you are not smitten, are you?"

"I would warn them of what they are doing," the doctor said, gravely.

"What they are doing?" said the friend "You speak as solemnly as if there was positive crime in this innocent exhibition of their daughter's talents. She really is very accomplished. M. Lefevre pronounces her a thorough French scholar, while Signor Faranelli is enthusiastic about her Italian. You hear yourself what a fine trained is shaded in the signor feranelli is enthusiastic about her Italian. You hear yourself what a fine to giant the ground-work of solid English studies."

"There, you look like yourself once more," her mother said, kissing her. "You must look your best this evening, for we shall have a party here. I cannot tell you how many of our friends asked permission to call and congratulate you." It was a pleasant evening. The fair young maiden, still in her fleecy muslin and soft white lace, played and sang for her mother's friends, chatted, and gained new laurels, as her future popularity in society was prophesied by those around her.

Before the summer was over, a new triumph was added to those Laura Garnett had already won. Among the more prominent men in Hillsboro, Martin Lester, head master of the Hillsboro College, stood foremost for marked talents and intellectual ability. A man past thirty-five Health Renewer." $1 he had been a student from early boy-hood, and had won his present honorable position by his worth and learning. Had position by his worth and learning. Had he been so inclined, he could have passed his life in studious ease; for he was the inheritor of a good fortune from his father, and owned the handsomest house and grounds in Hillsboro. But with all his love of learning he was a man eminently fitted to control a large institute like the Hillsboro College.

the highest honors of the Hillsboro Seminary, as the best pupil in all the "extra" branches.

Driving home through the soft spring air, with her mother, the girl still felt the excitement of the morning, and talked in an animated strain of the future.

"I think now, dear mamma," she said, "I will commence German, and give a little more time to my drawing. I really could not find time for either in school; but now I can divide the day to suit my self. There is one advantage in private instruction, that one does not have to wait for the recitations of a class."

So she planned, feeling, as was but natural, the gratified vanity of the praised and [petted scholar, and 'expressing a warm determination to keep up every study, even after she entered society."

But when the pleasant sitting-room was gained, and the long strain was over, Mrs. Garnett was alarmed at the sudden pallor and weariness that came over Laura's face. She sank down upen a low couch, gasping, "Mamma, I am faint! I am falling!"

You are tired," her mother said gently; "he down here, and I will get you some wine."

So, instead of sleep and quiet, the girl was stimulated by wine till her cheeks reddened again.

"There, you look like yourself once more," her mother said, kissing her.

"You must look your best this evening."

And the girl had nobly fulfilled the promise.

Standing upon the platform, receiving her prize from the hand of the gratified principal of the semnary, Laura Garnett attracted admiring glances from all in the crowded hall; but there was one gentleman who stood near the door, a man of some forty years, whose eyes saddened as they marked the fair girl's face.

The doctor was summoned, and looked very grave. He had been but a year in Hillsboro, but he recognised in an instant the, queen of the school exhibition whom he had pitied, while all others enviced and praised her.

"Has she been ill long?" he asked.

"She has not had much appetite lately, and she complained of want of sleep."

"Not weak or faint?"

"Oh, yes; very often. I give her a little wine every day. What do you think is the matter, doctor?"
