door to his hand—to sit upright on the top of his ink bottle, to come at his call and to go through many other performances of which the ordinary mouse has not even the fail nest conception. Deacons has always seemed fond and proud of its pet. It slept with him every night, making a warm nest for itself under the edge of his pillow, and was his constant companion. The bright-eyed little animal seemed to have entirely conquered its natural timidity so far as its master was concerned, and showed its foudness and gratitude for findness in every very stooned. For some time past Deacons has been trying to get another mouse, having planned to construct a ministure carriage and train the two to draw it. The idea had taken strong possession of his mind, and is talked constantly about it. But yesterday when the attendant entered his cell a dog belonging to Sheriff Hodgson followed him unobserved, and before he could be prevented had caught and instantly killed the little beast. Deacons emotion was genuine and unrestrained. Nothing that has occurred since his sentence seems to have moved him so much. He is still greatly disturbed, and every one about the jail sympathizes with him.
