

interests of the public at large, and should be able to think in political terms. It is they who should pass laws.

People are not born politicians; they become politicians. The important thing is to have an instinct for it. Tamara Sorvacheva has that instinct. She was a deputy in the city council for two terms, has always been active in trade union affairs, and knows how to convince people, to rouse them and to lead them. But, most importantly of all, she knows how to defend their interests.
