

of globalization and strategic alliances increasingly reflect a new reality in world markets. In such an environment, national legislation must be compatible with the needs of interlinking transportation and production networks. As a result, the scope for national unilateral legislation becomes even more limited than before, and increasingly, international fora have to be developed in order to promote dialogue between all parties involved in ocean transportation.