

II.—HER ARRIVAL

In which Kitty arrives in the city of big hopes and appeals in her confusion to the gallant constable for directions to the boarding house, the address of which a friend has written on a piece of paper. Young gentlemen of fashion (ready made) gaze curiously and with amusement at her attire. It seems to antedate the Christian era. But as Kitty has the American trait of adaptability it is not unlikely that in a short time she will surpass in sartorial smartness these carping Broadway Brummels. It is just possible—with fairly decent luck.
