OPERA FOLK IN WAR ON BACTERIA

Activity of Germ Experts in New York Seen in Metropolitan Opera House

(Times' Special Correspondence)

New York, March 26.—Guardians of the good health and comfort of the opera singers have apparently caught the spirit of the germ hunt which has been organizing in this city of late. It is reported at the Metropolitan Opera House that a cruise will soon be started against the micro-organisms that lurk amid the maze of scenery and properties of the great palace of music at Broadway and Fortieth street.

Recognition of the danger to the health of the singers comes as a result of a widespread effort here to educate the public in caring for hypertrophied tonsils and adenoids in the prevention of contagious diseases.

Less than a month ago the management of the Metropolitan Opera House prepared to experiment with new, colored disinfectants.

As far as can be learned there have been no complaints at the opera house from the soloists, although rumor had it a few days ago that Dini City had acquired tonsillitis from the eyes of "Armido" from some proving bacillus. The dark-skinned tenor, however, was able to appear in his usual role.

Dr. Lefferts A. McClelland, a celebrated authority on diseases of the throat, on being questioned regarding the proposed crusade, said that there was an increase of operations on singers' throats.

In discussing the danger to the singers, he declared that if properly performed an entire removal of the glands would impair the singing voice. "The pillars of the fauces after the operation should be left in their original position, so that the rounding muscles," he explained, "to eliminate completely the seat of infection in the throat the entire diseased tonsil should be cut away. Mere cutting off of the tonsil, as is done in the great majority of cases, is not sufficient, for the tonsil survives in the deeper crypts and tissues."

Much data has been circulated through the city by the Bureau of Municipal Research, partly as a result of which new methods of dusting are employed in many public buildings.

Found in the dust of the street, public buildings and residences are the germs streptococci, staphylococci, coli bacilli and others which find comfortable lodgings in diseased tonsils. Where these germs are prevalent in large numbers an individual may become prey to epidemics of diphtheria and scarlet fever.

Disinfectants act as incubators for the germs, and their toxins are excreted from these centres of infection throughout the body, causing rheumatism, fevers and, not infrequently, endocarditis.

The unusual amount of tonsillitis in New York in the last winter has brought much difficulty to managers and vocal artists, and it is believed that a process of sterilization of the Metropolitan Opera house is being undertaken.
