When you say you desire no higher lot than this, you speak out of your blindness. So can I fancy some Sybarite speaking, who maintains that there is no higher aim in life than the indulgence of invariousness. And while the world is grouning round about him, he, wrapped in his silken cloak of selfish ease and effeminacy, heeds not, hears not, the suffering cries of his brothers and sisters. Oh, 'cried Coltsfoot, with passionate fervor, "that I had been born to power as you were! that I possessed the capacity which is yours, and which you regard so lightly, of healing the wounds of a great people! I would lift my lance against ignoranc. I would give good opportunity to those who are born low down. I would root uncleanliness out of my land. I would honor true merit. I would wage war against the fashions which drift a nation upon the rocks of false morality. I would walk with my eyes open through the streets of my country, and I would be a priest to my people—a healer. By my example, I would make simplicity homored. Religiou, should be something more than a tradition, and God should be worshipped on Mondays and Tuesdays, and the other week-days—worshipped, as He should be worshipped, in houses and streets as well as in churches, by the living of good lives and the constant exercise of charity and virtue. So would I walk through my life and live my days, and fulfill the solemn trust which had fallen into my hands—leaving behind me, when my task was done, an honorable name, built upon solid foundation, and a heritage of good deed deeds to grace my children's lives, and make them loved throughout the land!"

Wise councillors, indeed, are they; they strike at the very root of evil; false fashlons and sham moralities fall beneath their lances, and glittering masks are torn from the faces of idols hitherto worship ed lu high places. Short as is the time that has clapsed since the events recorded in the last chapters, great deeds have been done, and, with God's help, greater still will be accomplished. Sassafras is beloved by all; and even more beloved than he is Bluebell, whose modesty, simplicity and goodness have endeared her to the hearts of the people. Their pictures—hers with a baby in her arms—hang upon the walls of every lowly cottage in the land; and when she walks or rides through the streets loving eyes follow her, and loving hearts treasure up the affectionate looks she bestows upon them. Iris, Lucerne and Daisy live in Bluebell's cottage, and many are the happy hours Sassafras and Bluebell spend in that dear home. And when the Good Season comes round again, men and women who have the means are influenced by the bright example set them by their King and Queen, and go among the poor and lowly, and the light of good deeds shines upon their way.
