Indian camp was not the only unsanitary spot in the city, but what I did say was that there are other places in the city, far more unsanitary than the Indian camp, and I am prepared to prove this statement.

Mr. Constable O'Connell, a few days before the Indians left for the hop-picking, visited the camp with me, and we were congratulating ourselves on the sanitary conditions prevailing there, also on the good behavior of the Indians while in the city.

It is not true that there were Indians on every available step on the cars, nor were there any of them hanging out of the windows. I was at the station when the train left for Agassiz, and the Indians were quite orderly. I had previously arranged with Mr. O'Connell to accompany them to their destination, which he did on the same train.

The Indians prefer to camp on the vacant lot referred to, as it is more convenient for them than camping on the Indian reserve at the west end of the city, as it would be rather inconvenient and expensive for them to have their effects hauled to the reserve and back again to the train or steamboat.

I may say that the Chief of Police also prefers to have them camp at the Market, as it is easier to protect them there from whisky peddlers, than if they camp on the reserve. However, as the property they now camp on, may be built on by the owners in the near future, it may be necessary for the Department to consider the advisability of
