Reviving the Third Option

by Allan Gotlieb and Jeremy Kinsman

Canadian foreign policy is determined by a view of the world shaped by national interests. There is strong emphasis on the need to find solutions for the great, global problems of the North/South dialogue and the growing tension between East and West. But the greatest foreign policy challenge is the relationship with the United States. It always has been.

The United States is the only country where the importance of the relationship is imposed on us. We do not have to work to promote the content of the relations. The interaction between the two countries is vast and complex. The management of border questions alone is sufficient to make relations with the United States a priority with any sovereign Canadian government.

The mere mention of three current border issues is enough to demonstrate the truth of this statement fish, the environment, communications. Each of these raise complex questions that defy easy solution.

- Whose fishermen will catch what, where and when? Canada has argued for the joint management of this vital resource. That call has been resisted by East Coast fishermen in the United States. They would prefer to take a risk with the future. Canadian fishermen cannot afford to take that risk.
- Environmental issues are becoming critical. Acid rain is the subject of current headlines, but the range of difficulties is as wide as the border itself. A roster of geographical place names is enough to call serious environmental problems to mind — Garrison, Eastport, Juan de Fuca, the Great Lakes.

Communications problems multiply with the growth of technology. Where is the border for air waves? Who owns the content of broadcast material? What controls are needed?

There is a host of such issues of direct day-to-day impact on the Canadian public. Many of them, such as the three mentioned above, are irritants to the relationship. The careful and continuous management they require presents a challenge to administrators. But they are not the whole relationship between the two governments. If they were, Canada-U.S. relations would be one constant day-to-day struggle.

The relationship goes far beyond these conflicts and irritants over border issues. It encompasses the

Mr. Gotlieb is Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. Mr. Kinsman is Chairman of the Policy Planning Secretariat of the Department of External Affairs. The views expressed are those of the authors.

produc deepest structures of the Canadian economic system and of the continent itself. The interests of the two countries are not always the same on these large questions, but this is compensated by a recognition both sides of the sense of long-term interdependence the two countries which gives the complex relationship a much deeper character.

econor econor

many US. b ture a they a dian de

pect.

nomic

essaril

Canad

ment i

velopn

that th

by Car

invest

not an

Canad

a cost

needs

streng

we ser

part?

plann

Cana

the 80

shifts

ments

discre

aniza

to do.

In P

speak

use o

our ov

is a m

in the

which

ical r

opme

coope

cies f

be fu

few s

thoug

hånd

and

close

reduc

futur

econo

S

It

W

Tł

Long-term strategy

This depth calls for more than a day-to-day proach to the the management of the relationship. requires a long-term strategy, though not an adversar strategy. The two countries are not adversaries. The are deeply and fundamentally very friendly to one a other. The type of strategy that is needed is one th provides for the realization of Canadian economic d velopment objectives. This does not mean a document or a White Paper that declares this objective. It mean a coherent approach on the part of the government pursuing Canadian interests vis-à-vis the Unite States. It also means ensuring that Canadian planning is done on the basis of valid assumptions.

This is not a call for a dirigiste approach or for w due emphasis on interventionism. The economic d namics are those of the private sector and they are the basis of the relationship. Much of the substance of ed nomic cooperation and interchange between the pr vate sectors of the two countries takes place on its ow terms. Nor does a coherent approach mean a fully con prehensive examination of all aspects of the relation ship. But it does mean that relations with the U must be considered in terms of Canada's own econom development and with a view to providing a more s cure framework for private sector activity.

Government is responsible for the general heal of the economy, and for its sound future developmen There are two main areas of application in any view Canadian economic development to meet the opport nities and challenges of the 80s: resource developme in the West, and the Maritimes, as a basis for soci and industrial development; and structural adjust ment and development in Central Canada. Since the U.S. is crucial to both areas of endeavour, Canadia have to assess the implications of two basic facts: U.S. takes 70 percent of our exports and U.S. owned ship capital has a predominant place in our economy In other words the terms of access to the U.S. mark are vital to Canada and many basic investment a other decisions in the Canadian economy are taken managers of U.S. based corporations. Thus Canadia

International Perspectives January/February 1981