HE WANTED HIS GIRL

She had Promised to Marry him and he Called for her.

The Wedding took Place Right The Outside the Barge Office.

A black eyed young man came panting into the barge office the other day.

"Is this the place where they keep the immigrant girls?" he asked in English so broken that even to the interpreters of the establishment it seemed to be made up of rolling r's and b's.

Receiving an affirmative nod, the man turned about and beckoned in the direc-tion of the open door. Four other men, all as black eyed as the first, made their. appearance.
"These are my witnesses," the leader of the party said by way of introduction of two of the newcomers, and then in turn he added: 'And this one is the clerk, and this gentleman is the priest. So give me my girl. and I'll marry her at once, so that you need not be afraid there is any humbug about it."

The interpreters' sense of humor is drawn upon too heavily for them to laugh at a scene of this sort. They got angry instead and asked him what he was talking about. He essayed an explanation, but all that he succeeded in making plain was that he was an Armenian and that his English consisted in rattling r's and booming b's.

"Why don't you tell your story in Armenian?" said one of the interpreters in the young man's native tongue. The would be bridegroom took offense. He had been three years in America, and he spoke English better than Armenian, he said. Finally Mrs. Stucklen, the "mother of immigrants," came up and shed light on the matter. man's name was Vahi Krihorian. He was 24 years old and made a comfortable living. At home he had a pret-ty girl, who now came to join him. Her name was Toshkowhi Gobedian. She was four years younger than he was and very bashful, so bashful that when she spoke of her love for Vahi and his prom-and her black eyes gazed at the leg of the matron's chair. "Have you got any money?" the clerk had asked ber.

"No, sir. I have a sweetheart." "But how do you know he'll marry "Because God would strangle him is

When the two were brought together, Vahi offered to kiss the girl, but she blushingly held back. "Don't you want me?" he asked despair.

"Yes, but there are so many princes around. I am ashamed. The wedding took place outside of the barge office, a clerk of the immigrant station being present to see that the cer-emony was really performed, and then the girl was declared Vahi's wife and free to "go out into America."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

HOW HE GOT SOUABE

A Young Drafteman Turned the Tables on His Employer

Who had Tried to beat him Down. Below Living Wages- re Didn't

A young Chicago man who came to this country several years ago unable to speak English was somewhat dependent upon his own countrymen at first. He was a fair draftsman, and as he had made the acquaintance of an architect of his own nationality he asked for work in that line and was accepted as an assistant for his supposed merit without any stipulated salary.

The first job he did was a perspective in color of a country home. He did it in three days and saw his employer receive $50 therefor. At the end of the first week he asked the architect how much he thought his services were worth. "I think I will pay you $4 a week," was the response.

"Four dollars a week," said the surprised artist. "I'll work on the street

"Work on the street, then. You are not competent to earn more in this country. You can't even speak the language. You'll starve to death."

So the young stranger worked on the street awhile, saved money, got to drawing pictures again, made the acquaintance of a young lady with some money also, married her and decided to build a louse for himself. He already owned a fine lot on the south side.

One of the first things he did was to hunt up his old employer. As he walked into the office of the architect that pleasant mannered person shouted: "Hello!

Come back for your job, have you?"

"I have come to consult you about planning my new residence—that is, I desire to find out whether you are competent to design a gentleman's house. The architect was surprised, but was anxious to get business, so he changed his manner and became quite obsequious.

He was permitted to go ahead with the After a week or so the young man ascended to the office again and found a complete set of plans waiting for him. Turning them over contemptuously and tossing them down, he snorted:

"Is that the best you can do? I can't use those plans. You don't seem to be competent to build an American gentleman's house."

The tables were completely turned.

The architect at last said: "Well, you have got even with me at last, but you ought at least to pay me something for my work on these plans."
"All right, sir," was the cold blooded response. "Just take it out of that $50 you received for that perspective drawing." and that was all he easy received in

FIRST IRONCLAD.

It Was Thought to Be a Boat of Super The Koreaus were the first to invent the ironclad warship. Iu 1592 the hordes of Hideyoshi landed on the shores of southern Korea and swept northward through the peninsuia, with the avowed purpose of crossing the Chinese border and overthrowing the hinese Empire. The Koreans colud offer no adequate resistance, for, while Korea had been at peace for several centuries and the science of war had received little attention, the islands of Japan had been one great battlefield, and the army of 160,000 men that landed on Korean soil were all veterans. The Japanese were provided with firearms, which had never been seeen

When, therefore, the Japanese forces swept northward toward the capital, and the King fled by night along the road to the Chinese border, Korea came face to face with a hard, uncompromising fact. She must either find some new means for holding the invaders in check, or she must go to the wall. The stimulus was sufficient, and in the person of Admiral Yi Sunsin Korea found the solution of the problem. The Japanese had penetrated the country as far as P'yeng-yang, and were there awaiting an army of reinforcement from Japan, consisting of 100,000 men, before conquest of China. Admiral Yi perceived that it was only by destroying this auxiliary force that the Japanese could be checked, and he realized moreover that, should it once set foot on Korean soil, all hope was gone. This grim necessity resulted in the invention of the kwi-sun, or "tortoiseboat." so called because of its resemblance to that animal.

The boat was covered with a curved deck of iron plates, and was provided with a ram. These two things formed its defensive and offensive equipment. With this boat, whose speed was exceptionally great, Admiral Yi boldly attacked the Japenese fleet of 600 boats, ramming them right and left, and as he passed on he left the struggling Japanese in the water, to be dispatched by his followers in the ordinary boats of the Korean fleet. The enemies deemed the tortoise-boat to be work of superhuman origin, and their "bones melted" within them.-Harper's Magazine.
