For five years the children of the hospital had looked up into his kind face, and each had received a right word and smile. Every one loved him, but it was the children only who brought forth his smiles and cheery words. To the others he was a grave, sad man, who spoke seldom except to give orders. When a little onedied, then the nurses would stand back reverently. when the great tears fell from the doctor's eyes; and as he held the tiny hands and caressed the little one's hair, they could not disturb him for they knew by his far away expression that he was recalling

Dr. Clayton's life had been an uneventful one till one day there came into his life such a love as is not born of earth. It was a lovely, high minded soul who drew him into realms of purer thought and being-his queen.
