Capital must have respect for labor no less than Labor for Capital. Better understanding between employers and employee will not take away the dignity of one or the other. A mutual confidence must have the effect of clearing up whatever difficulties in the past prevented the coming together of the man who works and the man who engages him. Conditions to-day are radically different from what they were a few years ago, and all classes owe it to the state to pull together in order that the wheels of the machinery of industry nay not be stopped, nor production diminished. The millennium may not have arrived yet, but the settlement of the wages question on Saturday night by the parties involved, coupled with the guarantee of bona fides on both sides, will be a step along the road toward the goal which
