CHAPTER XLVII.

Within the space of five minutes three cabs dashed up the long drive that intervenes between the Waterloo road and Waterloo railway station.

From the first cab sprang Noel Campbell, and after a hasty glance round, he assisted his mother to alight. He had hardly time to take her to a waiting-room, than up dashed cab No. 2, depositing Sir John Sterne, looking ten years younger than he had on the preceding evening, and his faithful valet, Markham.

"He's got wonderful powers of recuperation," whispered Markham, to Noel, as Sir John stamped his feet vigorously on the pavement, "and this time, God be willing, there's nothing to eat his heart out again!"

"Noel, my nephew," the baronet said, holding the young man's hand firmly, "you, whom I have hated with a fierce intensity, have proved yourself to be my best friend. Heaven forgive me for being so easily misled—for being so ready to think evil of others. And let me say right here, Noel—let me say it while none are near who cannot understand the eternal bond between us—let me say that I have cruelly wronged you, my boy, and beg your forgiveness. You are a noble fellow! Now where is your mother?"

He asked the question almost brusquely, and the old fire rushed into the telltale scar on his cheek.

"In there, uncle," Noel said, pointing to a waiting-room. "Deal gently with her. She is only a woman, and your sister."

"She is your mother," replied Sir John. "Let me forget that she is my sister. But, there!" he brushed his hand across his eyes. "We are all but human, and to be human is to be frail. I have been hard-hearted. Let me confess my cruelty. What right had I to withhold what I promised my father on his deathbed to allow his only daughter? She trusted in my honor; and in my anger—my weakness because she would not be controlled by me—instead of making your mother's annuity five thousand a year, I punished her with one-fifth of it. But every penny, with compound interest, is invested for her sole use and benefit. A handy little sum, my boy, amounting to upward of a hundred thousand pounds. That villain, Grant, knew all about it. He may well have reason to hate me."

He turned abruptly, and walked into the waiting-room, softly closing the door behind him.

What passed between brother and sister was only known to the angels, but Sir John emerged a little later, his face very much softened, and Mrs. Campbell's eyes were wet with tears. By this time Captain Parker was standing about the platform, while

CHAPTER I.

There could not be a prettier or more cheerful breakfast parlor anywhere than Sir George and Lady Ormsby's. They were fortunate enough to possess one of those old roomy mansions in Kensington Gore, that, defying the mania for building, have contrived to retain their large, walled gardens, and to be bright with leaves and flowers, shady in summer, and sheltered in winter, despite their proximity to the overgrown metropolis.

And Lady Ormsby, a Frenchwoman by birth, had all the taste and tact of her countrywomen. The heavy magnificence that the English love was permitted to reign in the salle a manger and the large drawing-room; but those apartments her ladyship preferred to use were arranged after her own designs, and the consequence was that the breakfast parlor was as cosy, bright and elegant as heart could wish.

What meal is more enjoyable than a well-served breakfast to which every one brings a fresh face and an unquenched appetite, and—Sir George would have added—puts in a punctual appearance? Though the best of husbands and fathers, he was, like all elderly gentlemen, apt to be fidgety, and display considerable irritability if his rules were infringed. Lady Ormsby, who knew this, avoided disputes by always taking her chocolate in bed; and it was Lily, the only daughter of the house, who presided at the meal, and dutifully buttered toast, and poured out coffee for papa, or when he lingered tediously long over the morning paper, soiced herself by teasing the grave old parrot, who sat on his perch in the sunniest window.

But just now Lily had more engrossing thoughts to occupy her mind than tormenting Polly. Although it was only her first season, and mamma had kept her birdies very closely under her own wing, she had won a husband for whom half the belles of society had been sighing. The young Earl of Bingham thought the beautiful Lily so peerless a flower, that, although his relatives hinted that he ought to have looked higher than the daughter of a baronet with a moderate income, he had proposed and been accepted. And now he was so eager for the nuptials to be celebrated in time for him to carry his bride to Switzerland at the close of the season, that Sir George and Lady Ormsby reluctantly consented to part with their darling at an early date.

She had tripped into her room, blooming with health and happiness, and was giving her father his maternal salute, when a sound at the door made them both turn, and, with a shade of sadness stealing over their faces, hurry to the assistance of the young man who appeared at it. A few weeks since Charlie Ormsby, handsome, gay and just of age, had seen life opening to him with the fairest prospects; now he had been warned that his days were numbered. He had accompanied two or three of his college friends on a yachting expedition, which had been one of unequalled enjoyment; but, within sight of port, they had been caught in a gale, and a sailor lad was washed overboard. Charlie Ormsby and another plunged into the seething waves to rescue the drowning boy, but without success.

The Honorable Morton Gage contrived to regain the vessel not much the worse for his efforts, but Charlie Ormsby was thrown upon some rocks to which he contrived to cling till his position was deserted from the shore, and a boat sent to his assistance. He had, however, received some internal injury when dashed upon the rocks, and when his parents, apprised of his condition, hurried into Cornwall, they found him apparently dying. But he rallied in a few days sufficiently to be brought to London, where the medical men called in pronounced his case a hopeless one. There was one dissentient, who ventured to suggest that nature might effect the cure that was beyond the skill of his professional brothers; but, as he was a gentleman very little known, and too modest to assert himself, he was snubbed into silence.

CHEEKS COVERED WITH PIMPLES Also Chin, Large and Red. Cuticura Healed.

"About a year ago a few small pimples broke out on my face. A month later my cheeks and chin were entirely covered with large, red pimples that festered and scalded over, and frequently caused irritation. I tried different remedies without success. I read an advertisement for Cuticura Soap and Ointment and sent for a free sample. After using it I could see an improvement so purchased more, and after using two boxes of Cuticura Soap, Ointment and Talcum for all toilet purposes. I was healed." (Signed) G. ## Degree Given to Dr. Nansen by University

NOTED EXPLORER PLEADS FOR USE OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"I have the honor to present to you for the degree of Doctor of Laws, honoris causa, Fridtjof Nansen, man of science, professor, author, explorer, and, shall I add, humanitarian, or philanthropist, or the man who shows pity upon all prisoners and captives; recipient of many honours, Nobel laureate; with the Grand Cross of the Victorian Order; Doctor of Philosophy for his scientific investigation on the nervous system, Doctor of Science Doctor of Common Laws, Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society and Ambassador.

With these words, Dr. A. S. Eve, MacDonald Professor of "Physics at McGill University presents Dr. Nansen, who holds the position of Professor of Oceanography at Christiania, to Sir Arthur Currie at the special convocation at the Royal Victoria College yesterday afternoon, to receive, at the hands of the Principal, the honor conferred upon him by McGill. No more fitting graduate had ever been presented to the Principal, Dr. Eve said. His record was such as would appeal always to the old and fire the enthusiasm of the young.

Great Tribute.

Sir Arthur conferred the degree with marked pleasure and pride, he said. Then, as the strains of the Norwegian National Anthem sounded through the hall, the large audience of students, staff and representatives of the Norwegian colony in Montreal rose in spontaneous tribute. Particularly did he appreciate such an honor coming from Canada. Dr. Nansen said in returning thanks. He had visited the Dominion 26 years ago and had been struck with the possibilities of the country which, in many ways, was similar to his own. He found great resemblances between the people of Canada and the people of Norway. They had to some extent the same simplicity, the same strength and energy to overcome difficulties which were a feature of the Northern race.

Speaking on world affairs Dr. Nansen said that since his previous visit to Canada the world had changed in many ways and in many respects, not perhaps, for the better. The situation in Europe was most grave and distressing and grave dangers were ahead if serious attempts were not made at reconciliation. The serious were affairs in some parts of Europe at this moment that the seeds of a new war were being laid. The feeling of distress was growing daily, and things were getting worse so rapidly that he was afraid they would have to be prepared to see great suffering in many parts of Europe, especially in Germany.

"Thinking men admit there is only one remedy—international co-operation, especially among the leading nations of the world," Dr. Nansen declared. "This is essential to unity in the future. The world is no longer separated. No great nation can think of the possibility of isolating itself

Consider Dangers.

It was this for the wise men of all nations to stop and consider the danger now drawing near. In national co-operation they would find the only solution of the present world troubles and it must be the watchword of all nations. He appealed to universities to take the lead in endeavoring to foster their spirit, for it was the young people growing up in the universities who were going to build the new world and make it better than the old.

In the League of Nations, the world had the organization which could bring about the co-operation vital to its welfare, Dr. Nansen thought. The League had its machinery, had no much experience, and could be used to solve the great problems of the future. People criticized the League to-day, asking why had it not solved the Ruhr problem and established an agreement between France and Germany. The most perfect organization in the world could not well tackle a question of such vital importance affecting the future of four great nations without each one of those Powers wishing the League to do so. And not one of these Powers had asked the assistance of the League.

Remember Austria. As an example of the work done by the League the speaker instanced Austria which had order restored within one year of asking the League's help, after large sums had been wasted and three years had gone by without improvement under the old diplomatic methods. As the Austrian situation had been assisted by the League so, the lecturer inferred, could the German situation be bettered. But the League must be asked to do the work.

Certainly Germany should pay reparations for the damage she had done. That was only fair and even though the reparations were very heavy, spread over a term of years and with international co-operation, it should be possible to settle the German problem, just as it had been possible to settle the problem of Austria.

The League, Dr. Nansen concluded, had acquitted itself as the moral force of the world. Because it sometimes fell short, constituted no reason for condemnation. No one thought of suggesting that the House of Commons should be abolished because of occasional failures. The League must grow because it was the essential institution for the world, vital for international justice and international peace.—Montreal Star, Dec. 5.
