LOVE FINDS A WAY. By JEANNETTE H. WALWORTH.

[Copyright, 1899, by Jeannette H. Walworth.]

"There! Don't say another word, please, Clarence. Did ever I expect to hear poor papa, who adores me and only asks to keep me by his side forever and forever, accused of maneu-vering to get rid of me like any daughter burdened society mamma? It is a shame, a perfect shame!"

'What! Crying about it? I do wonder why a woman's tear duct was made so perilously convenient." "Clarence, I hate you! There, now! I am quite sure I shall always hate culty

With a start she sat bolt upright in bed to find him standing over her the Matthews gate was reached. "You will come in?" Ollie asked, trying to be polite, in a smothered voice.

"Not tonight, thank you," the man she hated answered haughtily, and she ran up the walk alone.

The memory of Tom's unanswered letter smote upon her conscience. Her tiff with Westover primed her com-fortably for answering it just as she did, and for fear of a softer mood and a less decided quietus she wrote it immediately and ran out and mailed it.

Facing toward the house after drop-ping her letter in the box, she observed a bright light still burning in her father's study in the wing of the house. Entering it, she found him sitting in his office chair, surrounded by a hopeless litter of loose papers. His head had dropped forward on his folded arms. Apparently he was asleep. She laid her hand gently on his shoulder.

"Father, this is not right. It is very, very wrong. You know Dr. Govan has positively forbidden you any night work. You took advantage of my be-ing away. You don't love me, or you would not worry me so. You naughty papa!

The face that was lifted at the sound of her voice was white and drawn. The eyes that looked longingly ing into hers were heavy and bloodshot. "Don't love you? Don't love you?

"There! Good night, my darling. Now go." Seeing a gleam of open re-bellion in her eyes, he raised one hand Imperiously. "Obey me, my daughter!

"But, father, Dr. Govan"-

"Do not stay to argue the point with me. Olivia. I know my own business better than Govan does. I have work on hand that must be done tonight."

"Cannot I help you with it, father?" He smiled unpleasantly and pushed away a pile of loose papers with one

"No; you cannot help me, my child. It is not the sort of work I should like to see you engaged in."

"But you are not going to dispose of that great pile of papers before you sleep, father?" He did not answer her immediately.

Presently, slowly, almost reluctantly, he said:

"Yes; they must all be disposed of to-night." Again that short, unfamiliar laugh, more like the bark of an animal.

It startled Olivia by its strange un familiarity. She looked at him almost inquiringly. He moved restlessly under the scrutiny of her clear, loving eyes

"We have exchanged our good nights, my dear. I am waiting for you to re-tire so that I may resume my work."

Baffled, perplexed, sore at heart, she bent to kiss him once more and went away with the face of a chidden child and the anxious soul of a tender wom-an. Tears came to her relief when she had gained the shelter of her own
