CHAPTER XXVII.

Late to bed and early to rise, was clergyman as old as the hills, as deaf as the motto of Mrs. Smith. When one a post, and almost as blind as an kept a general store it was suicidal, so adder. If she did go there, and I doubt far as business was concerned, to shut one's shop early. Folks might want piness had been hers there, and to doubt it, it was because some bygone happiness had been hers there, and to visit anything in a hurry, from a bottle of unsweetened gin to a baby's comfort-er. And the same in the morning. Folk didn't all keep stores of everything in the house. Mrs. Smith felt it her duty to have the shutters up as short a time as possible, and acted accordingly.

It was 7 o'clock. The carrier had just called, and after wishing the worthy old lady good morning had deposited several wooden boxes in the shop. "Fish, I think," he said. "I seemed to detect the aroma."

"'Addicks," Mrs. Smith answered. this walk?" she asked. "It's not long since I introduced them, but they are going down well. Mr. Simes (Mr. Simes was the village fishmonger) will think I'm doing him a bad turn, but I can't help it; filthy was the only word to be applied to his dried fish, and the fresh ain't much better. Would you feel like a fresh-dried finnin (that was Mrs. Smith's way of profouncing it) yourself, Mr. Carter? If so, I'll just whip this case open, and you're very welcome.'

The carrier drew his hand across his lips and smacked them loudly. 'It ain't an offer to be refused, Mrs. Smith," he said, "and glad I am, and glad others is, that you've taken the fish in hand. Nature requires fish. Phosphorus is necessary to the human constitution, but nature also requires that the fish should be wholesome. Let me do that little job for you. No? Well, you were always a woman to do everything for yourself, and no one-let him he may—the King upon his throne, for that matter-could do it

Mrs. Smith had opened the box, selected a haddock of a golden orange hue, that spoke to her of a good rich full flavor, and was just wrapping it when someone entered the shop. She looked at the carrier and smiled.

"If I got up at cock-crow," she said, "I should have customers. And what" -she turned to the girl who had just entered-"can I do for you, my dear? If it's breakfast you're thinking about, I can recommend one of these"-and she pointed to the haddocks.

"I'm sorry it's not breakfast," Maria Bloor said, and her pretty lips smiled beneath her ugly goggle glasses. "I've come to see you, if you are Mrs. Smith. "If," the proprietor of the general store answered. "You don't come from these parts, my dear, or you wouldn't

"I am from London," Maria answered. If Mrs. Bloor had been there, she would certainly have wondered that the girl did not say, "I am from Aus-It would have seemed more natural, though last impressions are certainly sometimes strongest. "And I want to know whether you can tell me anything about Mrs. Carline." The carrier paused in the doorway. and wished Mrs. Smith good morning;

then she turned to Maria. 'The woman's been murdered, hasn't ?" she said. "I've not said a word case in the paper, and the photographer's evidence, and supposed it was he same. "Yes," Maria said. "She's been murdered-cruelly murdered. I want to find out by whom. Did you ever see her with a man here?

Mrs. Smith busied herself taking the into threepenny, fourpenny, fivepenny and sixpenny ones.

'Never," she answered, "though I've heard some folk caught a flying glimpse of one here and there; not enough to recognize him, you may be sure. such men are careful, but it's pretty clear who killed her, isn't it?"
"You mean-?" Maria said, and "I mean the man she called husband in the park, and, mind you, I think he was her husband. Mrs. Carline was a religious woman, not the sort of woman to go off the straight line."

Maria caught at one word. "Religious?" she said. "Then she went to church here? The clergyman would know something about her?"

Mrs. Smith shook her head. 'No," she answered, "she didn't worship here, she made no friends here. She was a strange woman, was Mrs. Carline. Some people fought shy of her, as some folk always will when a woman who is not a widow, can't or won't, give any account of herself. People do say she went into Market Burnham to church, but I don't know what would have taken her there. In spite of its name, there's not more than fifty souls in the place." "But a church, perhaps," Maria

"Yes, a church, certainly, and been married I should know. I should know, I suppose?—would the wedding-day of a woman who had been neglected as Carline was, have been a day of happy memory? If so, is it possible she was married there?"

She trembled a little as the thought came, and grew pale and afraid; but her voice was quite steady when she spoke.

calicoes. "Ah, that I can't say," she answered. "I don't know that she even went there at all, but one has the gossip brought to one. A woman in my position hears everything, both truth and lies. I heard a good many of what I am sure were lies about Mrs. Carline. She told me once that her husband was a sailor, bless me, they always say that when they can't produce them in the ordinary way. I've no business, I suppose, to be talking to a young girl like you like this, but you want to know about the woman.

Maria nodded her head. "Indeed I do," she answered. "Will you tell me how long ago it was that Mrs. Carline came here?" Mrs. Smith put on her thinking-cap. "A matter of three years of a little less, I should think." she answered. It's a quiet, secluded place," she went "It might interest you to go and have a look at it, quite shut off from the rest of the world. I remember the night-yes, it must be less than three years ago-a closed carriage rattled through the village and made us all start a bit. Half an hour later, Job Jellow, one of the men that drives the station flies, tells us that he's just driven a lady and gentleman to the Hermitage. He didn't seem to have noticed the man, but the woman was Mrs. Carline. He described her to me and I recognized her when she came in the first time. She was a radiantly beautiful, happy young woman then, and chatted to me pleasantly. I may be wrong, but I think somehow the day she came to the Hermitage was her wedding-day. She and the man, too, though no one seems to have seen stopped at the Hermitage for a week. Then one night off they went again for six months. Then she came back alone, but happy still, and then slowly her face changed. She never with the team, and as he is considered said anything to me, but it was easy to see she was fretting. Her husband had probably grown tired of her, perdeserted her. She was poor, I think. She bought less and less, then suddenly she gave up the house and went away, but she paid up everything Miller, that is the landlord, thought be-

It would have been more like him to have done it in somebody else's."
"Much more like him," Maria Bloor answered. Hope beat high in her heart when she left Mrs. Smith's shop. Why she took so great an interest in poor murdered Carline she alone knew, but she felt very strongly that some sentimental reason had drawn the dead woman to the little village of Market Burnham. If her unhappy marriage-for without doubt her marriage had been unhappy-had taken place there, that was, perhaps, the cause.

Only for Archie McConaghy, of Neepawa, the bonspiel would have been over today. He has won so many games that some of the draws so many games that some of the draws had to be delayed to allow him to play. He has played 22 games, 18 of which he has won. He is in the finals of the Brunswick, American, Abell and Dolge competitions, reached the fours of the Tuckett and the sixteens of the Grand Challenge.

FOOTBALL.

CAMBRIDGE BEATEN. CAMBRIDGE BEATEN.

London, Feb. 14.—The Oxford-Cambridge annual Association football match was played at the Queen's Club grounds today. The attendance was very large. During the first half Cambridge did most of the forcing, but at the interval the score was a goal to nothing in favor of Oxford. At the changing of ends the Cambridge men continued their forcing tactics, but the defense was good and the game ended with a score of 1 to 0 in layor of Oxford.
