"The Battle." "The Battle," a proble | play-not in the usual acceptance of the term theatrically, but another glimpse at the problem of capital and labor-was presented at the Grand Opera House last evening by Mr. Wilton Lackaye Wifey-When I pass a miliner's shop and his capable company to a fair house. It showed this great actor at his best. The story concerns John Haggleton, a multi-millionaire financier. His son-taken from him in [Punch.] Candidate for part of Juliet (to manager the tenement district, surrounded by f Shakespearean company)-Oh, yes, Mr. the poverty and sin of that sordid Stormer, I'm awfully gone on Shake- spot. He has ideas of social reformations, and has his father's tenacity of purpose in clinging to them. Haggleton tries to win his boy's affections, and goes into the slums. His business ability and powers of organization work wonders in that district. and the boy feels in himself the capacity for great business affairswhat his father desired. But the battle for his ideals comes on. His better nature-that nature which would force him back to these people to help them is personified in his sweetheart, the daughter of a man ruined in business by John Haggleton. They struggle, and at last the boy gives up his ideas for business and declares he will follow the people. This act wins for him his father's love, and he, too, decides to assist in this great work.

The play affords a new glimpse at the great problem, but it does not solve it. As a matter of fact, it is confusing. The apparent hopelessness of the question is summed up in a sentence near the end of the play: "How can you spend 10 millions of dollars on the poor of New York without demoralizing them?" That is like woman, the eternal question—somewhat of a tiddle.

Mr. Lackaye's enactment of the role of John Haggleton was a masterpiece. It o assist in this great work.

Mr. Lackaye's enactment of the role of John Haggleton was a masterpiece. It is one of the best roles he has yet assayed, and it was a performance not soon to be forgotten. As the keen, strong, masterly man of finance, he gave a vivid interpretation.

The Nordheimer Player-Piano

Anybody can play it, as the mechanical equipment is perfectly simple and adapted to all the records made for player-pianos. There are over 20,000 pieces of music which even a child can play on this player-piano. A new piece could be played every day for six years without repeating.

The playing mechanism is concealed within the case, and the instrument has the appearance of an ordinary piano. It may be played upon by hand if desired, the mechanical attachment being thrown on or off by the simple movement of a lever. The tone, construction, design and finish of these Nordheimer Player-Pianos are equal in every way to the regular pianos.

It would be a pleasure to demonstrate these instruments any time you favor us with a call at our warerooms. If you can't call, write for a booklet.

Instruments intended for Christmas delivery should be ordered at once.
