KOREAN QUEEN'S TRAGIC CAREER

Parent That Ended in Her Murder.

London, Aug. 3.-Kingly marriage in Korea is neither more nor less of a lottery than it is elsewhere, only the method of challenging fate is different. All the eligible maidens in the kingdom were bidden to the palace, and then happy Prince Charming made his choice, of course. No! That is the way it is in the fairy tales, but not in real life, not even in Korea, which in former days, at least, so closely pordered on fairyland. All the maidens selected by the provincial governors of the kingdom assembled in the tea pavilion outside the palace by the lotus pond. They stood attentive to please, as the unwed King, followed by the court, walked in and appeared, according to the ancient Korean om, with bared breasts. Suddenly, at a signal from the court chamberlain, all the aspirant brides sat down, or, more exactly speaking, squatted upon embroidered cushions, which had been carefully arranged in circles for this crucial moment. All the maidens squatted gracefully, of course, it goes without say ing, because they were all highly-bred maidens, worthy of a King's hand and couch, but a second later one of them, for the moment happiest among women, sprang in the air as though stung by an adder. No, that could not be, as her face was suffused with smiles, and a joy which even Oriental etiquette could not suppress reddened her cheeks.

A moment later this maiden of the Min family held aloft in her right hand with trimphant gesture a golden goblet, placed by fate, as some said, by the Prince Parent, as all knew, in the cushion upon WANTED-TEAMSTERS OR ANY PERSON which she sat. Twenty years later the Queen of the Mins was murdered and her mangled remains drenched with kerosene were burned not 100 vards from the palace pavilion where, by the ordeal of the goblet, directed by the Prince Parent, had been proclaimed Queen. While the hand that struck down the defenseless woman was that of a Japanese hireling, Advertiser Job Department.

In the course of the Queen's reign, then, as we may prop ly call it, the life and the death of politics answers to a long list of questions inwas the feud between her and the Prince Parent. That he survived to die quietly in a bed a few years ago shows what an adroit old fox the National Grand Duke really was. In the skirm shes of assassination which took place between him and the reigning lady, determined to rule, her father and two brothers were killed, and her nephew, though cut to pieces by a hundred swords, survived.

Nor is it to be supposed that the National Grand Duke escaped quite scathess. On one occasion a bomb placed under his sleeping stove blew him high in the air. which had proved so inefficacious, and resorted to strategy and spoils. What happened on that fateful night of Oct. 8, 1895, has been related many times and in many ways. The essential facts are that Japanese troops surrounded the palace grounds and held the populace and the loyal troops in check, that Korean troops anese soldiers, together with a number of Soshi, or unattached adventurers, rushed in, and under the guidance of men attached to the Japanese legation, made their way to the pavilion where the Queen slept. Her majesty, aroused by the tumult in the city, had apparently a fair opportunity to escape. Indeed, it is reported that she had already found a safe refuge in the vast park, when her maternal instinct, her idolatry for the imbecile boy whom the Japanese would not proclaim Emperor, brought her back to the palace, where she met her death. Dr. Chase's Oin; ment is a certain and guaranteed cure for each and
