CHATHAM, N. B., AUGUST 16, 1894.
AT LAST.
The years I spent before I knew you, Oh, the hills I climbed and came not to you, All who shall render unto us to make The things which for end of each other's sake We seek to have have been lost.
If you and I had not played together, Two speeches cables in the summer weather, By one sweet book which though it dried up long.
Still make me a sweeter song to-day Than any I know.
If I had in hand through the mysterious gateway, Love, Of whomsoever, we had first looked, and straightway, Had whispered to each other softly, ere Was dawn, 'Tis now in moonday hand and feet, If all of this had given its completion, To every thought it had added sweetness, Could I know whether it were well Or ill, With these, how could I more surely tell, More swift fulfil!
Alas! why this I sit and ponder, While the precious present while I wonder, About the days in which you grew and came So beautiful, and did not know the name Or sign of me.
But all that things are in the angels' keeping, No part to death for us, but only sleeping, The years of heaven will all earth's little pain Make good, and we can begin again To-day.
—Boston Budget.

THE DRUMMER'S STORY.
He was a voluble drummer from St. Louis; we were an interested party of listeners in the smoking room of the Pullman sleeper en route for Chicago, and when he pulled out his watch and remarked: "Good night, gentlemen, we begged him to stay and tell just one more story. After a moment's hesitation our entertainer resumed his story, and remarked: "Well, gentlemen, my stock's about run out, and this is not good to go to bed on, but here goes."
"In 1861, my uncle, Benjamin Richley, was tried, found guilty and sentenced to thirty years in the penitentiary. The alleged crime was murder, the victim one of his farm hands."
"Benjamin Richley was a wealthy farmer, and his farm was located in what is now a suburb of St. Louis. He was a widower with one daughter who was, so to speak, the apple of the old man's eye. He had no other relations, or if he had, did not recognize them. The old gentleman was known to possess an unquenchable temper, when aroused, and was also noted as being an honorable, just man."
"Adjoining the farm lived John Hiram, a weak witted young man, and a neighbor, an older man, who, I think, it was said, by his wife in the adjoining city. The younger Hiram was occasionally employed by my uncle to do odd jobs around the farm, and was at such times in the habit of coming to my energetic uncle, owing to his indolent habits."
"Benjamin Richley, a rich old chap, fell in love with Lucy Richley, and of course when the old gentleman heard of his wooing, he did not like it. He was a white heat passion and threw the young man out of his house bodily. Naturally, a man distinguished by such a feat would eventually, although no one ever heard him boast of such a feat."
"The following day my uncle, while passing through the woods, saw John Hiram sitting in a fence corner idly cracking nuts with a stone. The irascible gentleman again fell into a rage, and upon receiving an impudent retort, reached for a log lying near by, and in his blind rage struck him repeatedly with the iron blade. The man staggered back a step or two, and then fell, and lay, then dashed over the fence and made for the cover of the woods not far distant."
"A day passed, then a week, and a vain search ensued for the missing John Hiram. No one had seen him since the day of the trouble, and no one had witnessed the little scuttling man. My uncle bitterly repented his foolish passion and personally exerted strenuous efforts to find the missing man."
"Two weeks had become still no John. What had become of him? The neighborhood was now thoroughly aroused, the police were notified, and an official investigation followed. My uncle repeated his story in connection with the disappearance. Then came the grand denunciation of Benjamin Richley on hold and declared that Benjamin Richley had killed his brother and carried his body in a certain spot, which illegal fact he would undertake to prove. To substantiate this, two respectable men, farmers, who lived two miles from the Richley farm, swore that they had seen my uncle dragging his garden to the missing man."
"Right there, sir," answered both the men at once pointing toward a cluster of bushes about thirty feet away.
"About five minutes elapsed, when there was a frightened exclamation from the diggers, and a hat was produced, later the badly decomposed remains of a man was brought to the surface."
"My uncle gave just one look at the gruesome object then staggered back with a strange, gasping, hopeless cry, and said:
"My God, men, is it possible? and was overpowered as one in a dream."
"There were no doubts in the minds of any concerning the identity of John Hiram. His clothing, cut across the face, a fractured skull and tawny a braising in the lobe of the right ear, which the deceased had been accustomed to wear, all went to prove that this was the missing man; that he had died from the effect of a blow administered, and that he had afterwards been buried to conceal the crime."
"My uncle declared his innocence in a weak way, was found guilty and sentenced to the penitentiary for ten years. He confessed on the stand that from early childhood he had been a sleep walker, and that the night following the day of John Hiram's disappearance he had found his coat and hat lying on the veranda. This, he said, was a strange circumstance, as he invariably hung these articles upon an iron hook in his room, and he had never seen the coat and hat on the ground. He had a terrible suspicion hanging over him, but he had arisen in the night, put his coat and hat on, and sought the body of the man he had killed and buried it in the garden."
"My uncle only lived one year of his sentence and died praying forgiveness for his terrible crime."
"Benjamin Richley went to the war and was shot before the battle of Shiloh, according to my story."
"On the day shortly after the close of the war a man lay dying in a hospital in St. Louis. The disposition had made correct quite a figure at the time. He was the missing John Hiram, and the terrible revenge on my uncle had been executed out of the wily brain of the older brother."
"On the day so memorable to my uncle, and following the chastisement he had received, John Hiram had sought the cover of the woods. There the two brothers met quite by accident. Benjamin soon broke the ice, and related his story, and like a flash was suggested the opportunity of revenge. Commanding John to keep close under cover of the woods until night fall, when he would again return, the older brother returned to his home."
"At ten o'clock the brothers repaired to a graveyard near by and buried the remains of a young man who had been shot before the battle of Shiloh. Placing the body in a bag Benjamin compelled the frightened John to carry the remains to a spot near Mr. Richley's garden. There the body was dressed in John's clothes, the face unaltered, and the other details attended to carefully, including the hat and coat which were laid on a country boy, when the houses had few locks and bars in those days. John was given money enough to carry him a distance and his work might was duly suppressed with the horrible face awaiting him if ever returned or made known his whereabouts. So sternly had this fear been impressed on the poor fellow that the very next morning he raised himself on his elbow and gazed around fearfully."
"That was a momentary pause, when the drummer ceased talking, when one of the more curious said:
"But what became of Lucy?"
"Oh, yes, I had forgotten Lucy—Lucy's my wife."
CHARLES TAMBLYN.
Business Before Pleasure.
They were performers in the amateur theatricals. During the progress of the play at one time their presence was not needed on the stage, they sat together behind the scenes. Situated beautiful, indeed, in old-fashioned gown and powdered hair, and he, in court costume of a country squire, was the ideal of a cavalier.
For some time he had been very attentive to her, and although people had frequently remarked upon his devotion he had not come to the point of proposing. As they sat behind the scenes he felt that an opportune moment had arrived.
"Marie," he said, "you may not have perceived my liking, but I cannot deny it."
"I want to ask you to be my wife."
Just then the prompter called the girl's name, but she never returned.
"That's your cue," faltered the interrupted lover.
"Yes," she answered, calmly enough, laying her hand on his arm, "but never mind the cue. You seemed very earnest just now, and I want you to go on. What were you going to say?"
Wonderful Edition.
There is a theory that the man who thinks much over night sleep heavy lines in his face, and becomes contracted about the brows and around the corners of his mouth. It is probable that Edison has done as much pondering over things as not even his own mind. Situated in America, yet he has a face that is as free from the lines of thought and care as the face of the average child. Edison's manner carries out the available expression of his face. He is a little deaf, but he never annoys him, and he has a little rheumatism which he occasionally has to suffer from, but he is simple and inquiring. Nearly all of his conversation is interjection points, and he has an astounding facility in talking about himself. He is not much of a New Yorker nowadays, though for at least two or three times a week, and he has a great deal of time to devote to his own country—W. H. Wardrop at the Hamilton Canadian Club.
Both pictures and furniture should fall back against the wall as much as possible, leaving the greatest possible amount of space in the centre of the room, so that the individuals who dwell in the apartment will be the real decoration, the furniture and minor furnishings forming a necessary, agreeable and artistic background.
The New Liberal Whip.
Thomas Ellis, the new Liberal whip, is the son of a tenant farmer in Wales and so through a Welshman that he learned English as a foreign language. By temperament, too, as well as by origin, he is a democrat.
PERSONAL NOTES.
