THE RICH MAN WHO HAD FOUR SONS

There was once a rich man who had four sons. The sons were bold and adventurous. They left home and started far apart. Each son established a business, and all were successful. A time came when foreign rivals, jealous of the rich man and his sons, began to levy duties against them, which kept them out of the markets of their rivals. The sons, in turn, imposed duties against the foreigners, but as the individual business of each son was small, the aggregate business of their rivals, the foreigners, was better off.

Thereupon the sons wrote to their father, saying:

"Join us in combating our rivals. You are strong, and with your help we shall be able easily to meet and to repel the attacks of our enemies."

The father called his sons to him for a conference, and made a speech to them, declaring:

"I cannot help you, my children. I do not believe in a family union directed against foreign rivals. In my youth I was taught that to let alone and to live by Free Trade is the only wise policy. Were I to help you now, I should make my teachers appear to have spread a false doctrine. Surely you do not wish your father to refute the teachings of men who are dead and who cannot defend themselves. Better is it to die in defence of a youthful principle than to live by a youthful principle which is false."

"But, father," answered the sons, "we are loyal and affectionate children. We have strengthened the family bond. Why can you not similarly treat us?"

"Sons owe a duty to their father, but he owes none to them," replied the parent.

"At this the sons marvelled, and said to one another:

"Our father learns slowly, and is evidently under some strange spell, for he would not turn a deaf ear to our petition. Let us wait patiently, for he surely will recover. Then he will help us."

Moral: A wise father co-operates with his ambitious and loyal sons.

THE FATE OF FREE TRADE ISLANDERS.

Once upon a time a man was wrecked upon an uninhabited island. He liked the island so much that he built a boat, returned home, gathered his neighbors, and persuaded them to leave their own country and settle on the island.

At first the colony was prosperous. The island worked at their numerous trades, and there was plenty of a small gold mine on the island, and adopted a system of free trade.

Soon, the mainland natives found the island to be inhabited. Putting off the natives, the islanders, however, and friendly relations were established. The natives took goods to the island and sold them at a low price.

"When however, the islanders offered to sell goods to the natives, the latter would not buy."

"Why not?" they said, "compels us to pay tribute on any of your goods."

"We take into our country. He does not want it, and he does not want it."

"We are going to give you a list of goods you manufacture. By keeping your products from our land, he is able to sell them at a low price."

"He has put the unemployed to work, making the commodities we could buy of you and these goods we purchase with the gold you pay us for our manufactures."

The leader of the islanders was greatly amused at the argument of the natives. He called together his council and explained the matter.

"They argue the abilities, these foreigners," he said. "Evidently they are ignorant of the beneficent operation of free trade. Let us show them how much better off we are than they, though they sell to us and we do not sell to them."

THE RIGHT WAY.

All the members of the council agreed, except one. This dissentient member said:

"We ought to levy tribute on the goods of the natives who inhabit the island. We can then compel them to agree to a system of free trade, and we will buy their goods from us as well as sell to us."

But his fellows would not listen. Then the natives began carrying to the island goods similar to those the islanders made for themselves. Because they were offered at a low price, the islanders bought the foreign manufactures and asked for more. One by one the islanders, whose products they desired to spend on cheap, imported goods, considered themselves fortunate that prices of commodities were low.

Then came a day when the gold was exhausted, and the islanders found themselves in dire distress. The prolonged period of unemployment and enforced idleness impaired their efficiency at their various crafts. For a time they lived on the fruit and grasses which grew on the island.

The lower standard of living weakened and unmanned them, and they became decadent. The climax of their misfortune came when, without warning, the natives sailed in force from the mainland in their war canoes and annexed the island, and made the islanders a subject race.

Moral: Beware of the foreigner who wants to sell, but not to buy.

THE MAN WHO WAS AFRAID OF HIGH PRICES.

There was once a man in a Free Trade country who declared he would never, no, never, vote to protect labor against cheap alien competition.

"Think I'm a fool?" he asked. "Why, prices would go up so high if we had tariff that I couldn't support my family."

"Why would prices advance?" asked a friend.

"Because there would be no foreign
