The excavation of the New York State barge canal is being done on some sections by machine of unusual capacity. Conspicuous among these is a bridge conveyor, sometimes known as the grab machine. It consists essentially of a cantilever tridge, 428 feet in length and 90 feet in depth, supported on two travelling towers, and a grab bucket of truly Cyclonean dimensions operated from the cantilever. The bucket weighs 17 tons empty, and its jaws when extended are 20 feet apart, and measure 10 feet in width. The capacity of this huge maw is a dozen cubic yards or from 12 to 15 tons at each bite. The jaws crunch together with an ultimate closing power of 137 tons.
