

New England Hereford breeders who dream of breeding ten cows should be admonished by this bit of history. It was the easy-feeding, early-maturing, compact qualities of the Hereford that "compelled the surrender by the greatest rival breed of its carefully-nurtured ideals of bovine excellence—a surrender to type, though not to breed. But these ideals, expressed in great scale and bone, did not square with the necessity of showing a greater net profit than the once despised 'little white faced runts,' and the 'old order changed'."
