THE NEW NATIONAL POLICY.

- Honest appropriation and expenditure of public moneys in the public interests.
- Appointment of public officials upon considerations of capacity and personal character and not of party service alone.
- More effective provisions to punish bribery and fraud at elections, to ensure thorough publicity as to expenditure by political organizations, to prevent the accumulation of campaign funds for corrupt purposes and to prohibit contributions thereto by corporations, contractors and promoters, to expedite the hearing of election petitions and to prevent collusive arrangements for the withdrawal or compromise thereof, to provide for a thorough investigation of corrupt practices, and if necessary to appoint an independent prosecuting officer charged with that duty, to simplify the procedure therefor and to enforce the law so amended.
- A thorough and complete reformation of the laws relating to the Civil Service so that future appointments shall be made by an independent commission acting upon the report of examiners after competitive examination.
- Such reform in the mode of selecting members of the senate as will make that chamber a more useful and representative legislative body.
- A more careful selection of the sources from which immigration shall be sought, a more rigid inspection of immigrants and the abolition of the bonus system except under very special circumstances and for the purpose of obtaining particularly desirable class of settlers.
- The management and development of the public domain (in which are to be included great national franchises) for the public benefit and under such conditions that a reasonable proportion of the increment of value arising therefrom shall inure to the people. The operation and management of our government railways by an independent commission free from partisan control or interference.
- The development and improvement of our national waterways, the equipment of national ports, the improvement of transportation facilities and consequent reduction of freight rates between the place of production and the market whether at home or abroad and the establishment of a thorough system of cold storage.
- The reorganization of the present railway commission as a public utilities commission with wider powers and more extended jurisdiction so as to establish thorough and effective control over all corporations owning or operating public utilities or invested with franchises of a national character.
- The establishment after due investigation of a system of national telegraphs and telephones under conditions which shall be just to capital already invested in those enterprises. The improvement of existing postal facilities especially in newly developed portions of the country and the inauguration after proper inquiry as to the cost of a system of free rural mail delivery.
- A fiscal policy which will promote the production within Canada of all useful articles and commodities that can be advantageously produced or manufactured here or by means of our natural resources having due regard to the interests of the consumer as well as to the just claims of our wage earning population.
- The promotion by negotiation, legislation and other constitutional means of a system of mutual preferential trade within the Empire.
- The restoration of the public lands to the province of Alberta and Saskatchewan upon fair terms.
- The unimpairment maintenance of all powers of self-government which have been conferred upon the provinces of Canada under the constitution.

THE SOCIAL GULF

"That's all right; that's as it should be," he said with grotesque satisfaction. "You're a lady, every inch of you, you take after your mother, though strange to say you ain't like her in looks. You stay where you keep as you have been going. There's plenty of money, and if there wasn't I could make some more. I've got the knack of it." He raised his head with a humble kind of pride. "I'll send you more, ever so much more—"
Diana turned to him with a gesture of despair.
"This money, ah, this money." Suddenly: "Why did you not offer some to the man, the wretch who—when Garling shook his head.
"It wouldn't have been of any use. He'd have bled me to death and spent every penny. He'd have wanted to know how I got it, have learned who I'd been, have dug up the past, and found out about you. I'd rather work as his slave for the rest of my life than he should do that."
The simple statement went to Diana's heart; and she flung up her hands before her face, crying:
"Oh, what shall I do, what shall I do!"
"Just what I say, missie," he answered for her. "Go on as you've been going. No one will know. I'd rather have my tongue cut out—beg pardon, dearie, my rough way of speaking ain't fit for a lady to hear. No, no; don't you be afraid. I shall never ask to see you again—"
"But don't you see that—that," she said with suppressed anguish—"that my place is by your side? I am your daughter, and wherever the father is his child should be. I must go with you. Yes, I must go with you!"
He sprang to his feet, his arms outstretched, his rugged face working; then, as, despite herself, she shrank back from him with a faint cry of terror, he stopped and let his arms fall, as he had let them fall once before.
"Don't you think, that, Diana," he wouldn't be right. Why, I might be looked at any moment. When I go to this man that's got the pull of me and tell him I've chucked the job—He stopped and shrugged his shoulders significantly. "No, no! I'll go my way and you go yours, missie. And if you give me a thought once and again, why, think of me as if I'd really died out there in the wilds. Think of me—not as you saw me last night, not as you see me now, but as the honest man as worked hard to scrape some money together for his little girl, to make a lady of her."
"Ah, you don't understand!" Diana
