Ex-Kaiser PleadsInnocence.

CONSIDERS HIMSELF PRIVATE GENTLEMAN WHEN TOLD OF PROBABLE TRIAL.

Amerongen, Holland. — "By what right would they force me to submit to this indignity—to be the object to be stared at and ridiculed by a vulgar crowd? For what crimes am I to be tried? I am innocent of any but the crime of endeavoring to maintain peace when I was threatened on every hand. Cannot my enemies be content with the victory they have won without thus trampling upon the vanquished and the fallen? My one wish is to end my days as a private individual, to live the life of a private gentleman, free from the fetters of statesmanship."

Such were the first words the ex-Kaiser uttered when, in the castle at Amerongen, he learned of the decision of the Allies to place him upon his trial in London. He asked, "save to satisfy the idle curiosity of the English—to pander to their natural vanity."

It was Dr. Rosen, the most intimate friend of the ex-Kaiser, now like his royal master an exile in Holland, who broke the news of the Allies' decision. The ex-Kaiser had retired for the night when the doctor reached the castle, and Count Bentick and the new arrival sat discussing the news.

When it was known that the Kaiser had completed his breakfast the information was conveyed to him that Dr. Rosen desired an audience. There were five persons present at the audience, which lasted close upon an hour. The company were the ex-Kaiser, the Kaiserin, Count Bentick, Dr. Rosen and the count's secretary.

"Of What Am I Accused?"

Dr. Rosen was deeply affected, for, after bowing to the ex-Kaiser and kissing the hand of the Empress, he commenced by informing the Kaiser that he had grave news to impart.

"These are grave times," returned the ex-Kaiser, "but I am now a free and independent person, but would to God I could see the Fatherland placed in happier circumstances. Why is it you have come to me at this hour, Rosen?" he asked. "Does the Fatherland need me?" he added as a conclusion.

"The Fatherland needs you, sire," returned the doctor, "but I have come to inform your majesty of what the enemies of the Fatherland are now plotting."

"This concerns my person?" asked the ex-war lord. "Come, Rosen," he said boldly, "tell me of it. I promise that the plot shall not worry me greatly."

"Your majesty, the Allies have declared their intention that the Kaiser shall be placed on trial in London."

At first Wilhelm appeared dazed, and could scarcely appreciate the significance of the doctor's words.

"One might have expected this," said Wilhelm slowly and gravely. "I am not surprised that it should have been the British who have decided this. Is there no limit to their vanity, to their audacity? What are the crimes of which I am accused? By what right would they submit me to this indignity—to be the object to be stared at and ridiculed by a vulgar crowd? Surely I have suffered enough. I am innocent as you know of any crime, save that of striving continually in the cause of peace, and to make the Fatherland a nation to be admired and esteemed. On every hand I was surrounded by enemies who sought the ruin of Germany. This is completed now, and I am about to be tried." Wilhelm laughed a harsh bitter laugh but his face was deathly pale.

Th ex-Kaiserin appeared overwhelmed at the news. She rose and approached her husband whispered to him. Her words had an almost instantaneous effect upon the ex-Kaiser, who, straightening himself and looking proud and defiant as ever, said, "Why should I submit to this? I am a free individual, and have been granted the hospitality of Holland. Holland will protect me from the enemies who seek my further degradation."

"I Am Ready."

"If Holland fails your majesty there are hundreds of thousands of true Germans who are ready to die for your majesty." It was Dr. Rosen who spoke, and the Kaiser hearing him smiled. "Thank you, Rosen," he said simply. "I know I have still many friends who are ready to aid me, but I would have no further bloodshed. If I can further the cause of the Fatherland by my death then I am ready and happy. Though I am no longer Kaiser, my one thought is of my people and my land."

"Your life shall never be taken," exclaimed Rosen, "such a sacrifice is not demanded of your majesty."

"I have seen the wording of the treaty which has been signed," returned Wilhelm calmly. "I can read the meaning of those words. They may try me for offences which they conjure up, and the penalty will be death, at the best banishment to some desolate island, as in the case of Napoleon. There is no limit to the audacity of the British, and the French have no even more than do the British."

"But your majesty there is a way to avoid this. It has already been pointed out to your majesty," said Rosen.

"I know, I know," returned the Kaiser, "but why should I leave this place, where I am content to remain? If I followed the desire of some who are my most loyal supporters and friends I should but still further compromise the position, and bring further distress upon the Fatherland. I have chosen to be a private gentleman, and as such I would end my days in happy surroundings in Holland. If I am not allowed to pursue the pathway I have chosen—one which I am convinced is the best for the Fatherland—then I must submit to the conquerors."

In the Hands of God.

"You shall not be made the victim of their hate," said Rosen, but Wilhelm merely smiled, and said, "They call it justice. Leave me now, Rosen; I must read this speech, which by this time will be printed in the newspapers, and will consult you before any definite steps are taken. I am resigned, and place myself in the hands of God, who will protect the innocent." Although the Allies' decision was not by any means unexpected by Wilhelm, the fact that the decision had been announced came as a severe shock to him, and, for all his apparent calmness, he suffered mentally.

against any attempt to hand the ex-Kaiser over to the Allies. It is now contended that the ex-Kaiser is a free man, at perfect liberty to leave Holland should he desire, since he is not accused of any criminal offence, but merely is to be charged with moral offences under the League of Nations. Doubtless if pressure is brought to bear upon Holland, the ex-Kaiser will be handed over, or he may even go so far as to voluntarily surrender himself to the League of Nations. But it is far more probable that the ex-Kaiser will have been smuggled out of Holland by the Prussian militarists, who have vowed he shall never be placed on his trial, before this is actually accomplished.

Mercantile Football.

At the Tannery Grounds last evening, Marshall Bros' team defeated Ayre and Sons' eleven by a score of one goal to nil, after a fast clean game. Mr. Jones, of Ayre and Sons, was referee, and the winning players were, N. Moore, D. Wells, S. Rowell, A. LeDrew, F. Cluett, W. Boone, T. Eldridge, A. Kennedy, R. Coleman, T. Whelan, and F. Brown.

During the game Moore and Brown were slightly injured, but resumed play after a few minutes. Much interest is now centred in the clerks football and already five teams are in line, Ayre & Sons, Marshall Bros, Baird's, Steer Bros., and Bowring Bros. Lively games are looked forward to, and it is not unlikely that the next season will see a lively series of mercantile contests. Last evening's game was the third of the series.
