Mr. Coaker's Diary.

(Public Opinion.)
 These very entertaining and disagreeable notes of a journey to the interior of the country through the hills of the Orinoco, and incidentally upon the tragic fate of the "Mandamus" row, says Mr. Coaker, "Raleigh in 1595 sailed in the El Dorado, or gold ship. He failed to locate the gold mine, and so lost his head, but was buried in the Orinoco River to-day is a station built by regular steamers from the site of the old fort, and is called Raleigh, and this is the depot for traffic with the interior."
 Raleigh camped where the gold mine is to-day working; he did not have any knowledge of geology, and would have found the object of his quest and lived in honor and glory.
 But many people mistake the story of the press for a lie, and say that Raleigh was a very keen observer, and that he was very well equipped with the most modern methods of drawing correct inferences from what he saw, and so falls into the error of not always what they was rather a poor requital for services rendered by Raleigh that he was to find the El Dorado. He had had his head cut off, but the thing it would be to-day to adopt similar methods. We may heads would have failed to find coal.

 Now much, if any, Raleigh knew of geology I do not know, neither do I know what help a knowledge of geology could have been to a man who was in an unknown country, and who was in an age when it might be said that he was a very poor fellow.

Mr. Coaker was unknown, but such Mr. Coaker reveals to us in his diary, Raleigh was nearer to a deposit where he built his fort than Mr. Coaker, et al., near coal account at South Branch, although we are living in an age when geology is an inductive science, and occurs in a well-defined position on the earth's strata.
 Mr. Coaker was in all horizons and in rocks of every description.
 The Danish scientist of the 19th century, was probably the first to make a geological map, but it was not until the middle of the 19th century that it became an inductive science, and to attempt a clear, upon the map of Raleigh, as Mr. Coaker does, is a waste of time.
