HELEN MOIR

Love and Honour.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XVI.

That was a blessed moment, for though it was shrouded in sorrow, the sorrow was made sublime by its triumph over temptation.

Hermann did not say he was reconciled to Helen's resolution. With the first terrible weight of its meaning full upon him, his heart could not possibly be reconciled to it.

And Edwin Allerton was perfectly sincere in this. To him scruple really was absurd, and had the circumstance arisen in his own case he would have disregarded it.

These were the sentiments he briefly gave utterance to at the Villa, and also to Mignon Lessing the next time he saw her.

When Madame Rheinbach received the intelligence, it filled her at once with grief and admiration.

That very night the Herr arrived from Glasgow, and she resolved to make him acquainted with the truth.

He sat at the large oriel window which looked out upon the bay, and Madame was sewing at a table close beside him.

DANGER IN THE TREATMENT OF SMALL-POX.—If a patient, in the beginning of the attack, be put in a room from which absolutely all light is excluded save that of a candle, the effect is to arrest the disease in the papular or vesicular stage.
