Responsible Government—What is it like?

A London caddy—so the story goes—upon hearing some remarks upon the Reform Bill, inquired, "What is it like?" Anybody who has seen, for instance, the people of British Columbia have long and eagerly sought for constitutional or responsible government. That form of government is now within their grasp. It is upon a point of view, however, that the people are not to judge the merits of the bill, but to see whether it is a fair and equitable one. The bill, it is said, is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one.

Further premised (another point) last night by the opponents of the Bill. The bill is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one.

Our exclusive dispatch received late last night announces that the Terms of Consideration have finally passed the Commons with a majority of eight, and that they will be debated in the House on Monday. Our correspondent reports that the bill is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one. It is a fair and equitable one.
