the methods in the study of economics. At first a priori theories and principles were framed, and the science and facts were con-structed from them. Then the vocabulary was made—the all important test of lin-guistic affinity. Later the true means of classification was found in grammar. In the theories of Bentham, Rousseau and others the a priori side of economics is well illustrated. Bentham found the object of social organization in the "grastest good of -The ravages of cholera infantum and summer complaints among children is truly alarming. See Dineen's silk caps. Even to day the true method is not used. Mr. George claims that under existing society the poor will become poorer and the rich richer. This proposition he holds as the result of a complicated deduction. Is it not strange that he should not prove so important a doctrine by convincing statistics? The theories of Spencer and of Hobbes on the theory of religion are quite alike, only the latter evolves out of his in-ner consciousness, while the former studies the customs and beliefs of nations. Spencer and the advocates of the laiss: z faire doctrine disregard this caution. Because factory acts and similar restrictive measures were not needed before, is no sign that they are not needed now. The true historical method is one that regards social phenomena as living and moving, that itself works for progress and advance, and does not strive for revolutions. Clever Capture of a Bold Thief. A commotion was caused in the post office yesterday by the discovery, that a registered letter containing about $100 had been delivered to the wrong Frank Ander-son; the right Frank came to claim it in the course of the day. Inquiry at the house where the letter was delivered proved that the recipient of the money had yesterday departed for England by the Grand Trunk train. The postmaster, however, took steps to have him arrested at Kingston, which was effectually done.
