He was leaning against eld Beauty's stall one hand grasped the hay-fork, the esther was lost in the capacious pocket of his overalls. As usual, his coarse, brown hair was thickly decorated with cats and tiny wisps of straw, while a mouthful of the same dry material was being ground between his teeth. Now and then Beauty's head was thrust over his shoulders accompanied by a soft whinny, this being an invitation for a treat. Generally she received an apple or a carrot, but always something, so fond of his old mare was Jim. A ray of sunshine came through the open door and fell ab his feet, perhaps pay ying homage to his homes, unselfath nature. "Tall ye what, Carlton, there aim a pootier gall this side of Dolby than my Stelly. Fact is, she's too good for sich a big clod like me; a perfect angel, she he, Carl."

The sun was going down beyond the stretch of woods skirting the meadows of Jim's farm as we went across the stable yard and through one of the loveliest gardens it has ever been my fate to see. Jim led the way to the front of the house to where upon the porch was seated a dainty little thing, who appeared at first sight to be all white muslin and yellow hair, and who seemed to be deeply interested in a book.

I'll never forget ye," and with a grip of the hand he was gone.

Presently I arose to take my leave, Jim coming down to the gate with me.

"I can't go any further; she might come back any minute an' be disappointed at not finding me. Ye'll come over toe norrow, Carl, won't ye? I'd be glad to see ye, an' so'd Stelly." I promised and bid him good night.

"I was soon hidden among the cake that formed an archway on either side of the lane; dreary and dark except where the moonbeams pierced the leafy wall and fell in shafts of silver across the path. Not long after I had entered this lonely retreat I heard footsteps preceding me on the wooden walk. There was more than one, for presently a wide opening allowed the moonlight to stream through, and I saw a man and woman walking arm in before me. The mellow light fell on the latter's golden hair and the folds of her white gown. As I drew near I recognized by the low but clear tones my friend's wife.

"So Jim followed his Stella after all?

"So Jim followed his Stella after all? Whatever brought them here?" I asked for the man's voice did not belong to Jim, but it was a stranger's I remembered hearing at the Dolby hotel. I could not resist listening to the conversation. Something impelled me to almost creep back of the couple. I now knew that the man's arm was clasping Stella's slight form. "Must it be to morrow night, Clarence?" she was saving.

"But it's so soon, dear, and it will hurt Jim so much. You can't imagine how fond he is of me." The voice was pleading.
"Bah! that country sonash! You are so careful of his precious feelings, my dear, perhaps you had better return to his humble abode, and churn butter and pick potatoes, since you prefer his boarish love to mine."

Had she gone? Was poor Jim enduring torments worse than mine? Or had she repented and withstood the tempter's wiles? I had heard that voice in New York, on the train, and somewhere else, and I knew to whom it belonged. Stella

At Funfkirchen, in Hungary, a terrible explosion has just occurred, in which the inventor of a new sort of dynamite has fallen a victim to his own invention. The man, a German named Lisch, resided with his aged mother in an isolated house, in which he was accustomed to carry on his dangerous trade. He had sold the patents for his new explosive in America and elsewhere. Just prior to the explosion he was engaged in nailing up a box containing a consignment of the material, when suddenly the whole blew up, unroofing the house and burying the inventor and his mother under the falling ruins.
