THE FATE THAT DEIVED.

"Do you think there would be any harm in it, Aunt Patty?" "Lots of girls do," you know, just for fun. "Then they ought to be ashamed of themselves," said my Aunt Patty, jerking her spectacles grimly into their black morocco case. "I don't know what this world is coming to when—"

But I didn't stop to hear Aunt Patty's lecture. I knew her rebuke just what was coming—I could have said it all of like a lesson—I went up stairs to my own room and sat down in front of the looking-glass with folded hands, to stare at myself.

"I don't think there can possibly be any harm in trying, in spite of Aunt Patty," said I to myself. "Kitty Crook got a good husband by advertising—all in fun, of course; but then it turned out real earnest, after all, and I want one too. Myself! 'Lily Lovelidge,' and if anything comes of it I'll appear a something. I will be some sort of a variety in my life, even if it is nothing else."

I was a motherless girl, devoid of maternal care and advice, making up my mind according to the whim or caprice of the moment.

So I wrote the advertisement, and this is how it ran:

"A young lady of fortune (mamma had left me five hundred a year, and by my limited vision this sum amounted to some thousands) would like to form the acquaintance of some cultivated and refined gentleman, suitable for matrimony. Address—Lily Lovelidge, Lansdowne Post Office."

And I put it in the paper.

Three days afterward I got a letter addressed in a fine, sprawling calligraphy to "Miss Lily Lovelidge," as follows:

"Miss Lily Lovelidge is informed that a gentleman answering her description, who pines only for the love of the one and true, desires the pleasure of her acquaintance, and desires to call on her at the post office will receive grateful attention."

With a beating heart I sat down and wrote to M. C., these lines:

"There is a lightning-blasted elm at the south corner of the park. I shall be there on Wednesday afternoon at four o'clock. LILY LOVELIDGE."

It was a lovely August afternoon when I wended my way toward the old lightning-blasted elm.

My heart gave a great commotion as, drawing near the bench under the elm, I saw a gentleman sitting there smoking.

Tall, dark-eyed, handsome. Dressed like a prince of the blood and wearing diamond studs in his line. I had had my dreams of the adorable chevalier, but this bright reality surpassed them all!

In my consternation I dropped my parasol and stumbled, after my own ungraceful fashion, over the bonnet of my friend. In an instant the gentleman had flung away his cigar and hurried to my assistance.

"I hope you are not hurt," said he, solicitously.

"Oh, no; but it is so awkward." And straightway I began to cry.

"I don't know how it was, but we seemed to get acquainted in five minutes after that. He was a stranger in town; he told me that at once. He was a lawyer, Marcus Clifford by name ('M. C.' 'goose' to myself). And then I told him I was Lily Field. And he asked me to marry him, and I said yes. And all this time neither of us dared to allude to the advertisement. Well, if he didn't wily should I!

And now, with the privilege of storytellers, I take a great jump over three months of time.

Just married—and Marcus looking into my eyes as if they were real lode-stars instead of two poor little weakly gray orbs, altogether too wide apart for beauty.

"My darling, how sweet you look in that little traveling-hat," he murmured.
