THE START IN LIFE.

Mrs. Danby was the widow of an officer, who some twenty years ago, when quartered in her native village, captivated by her blooming face, had married the late Mr. Danby. She returned at his death, with one little daughter, judging from experience, that the slender provision, which was so soon to be exhausted, would secure her a comfortable subsistence at home; and by good management, and keeping her own counsel, it really answered all the purposes of a fortune in her hands.

Every one hastened to welcome her, and every one tried to assist—all gave her credit for her good sense in retaining her early home, and her friends—none had suspected that necessity had influenced her choice; and all at once she found herself, for the first time in her life, a person of consequence in the circle in which she lived.

But, unreasonable woman, this did not satisfy her; she had been all her life clinging to the hope of a better fortune, and she had been disappointed; she had been disappointed in her husband, and she had been disappointed in her friends.

Mrs. Danby, as we have said, was too true-hearted, too gentle; she made no vain pretensions, and her conversation was well calculated to interest, and to please; she really was so well, that when Frank Nugent began to love her, he was not long in finding out that she was a woman of sense and worth.

Frank's eldest brother, George Nugent, indeed protested that they were a couple of fools; Frank for selling his hunter, and giving up his free quarters at home; Mary for retaining a rich old squire, who had been her lover, and who had been her guardian.

But, what was the matter with her? she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, and she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, that she had become a widow in her own mind.

She had been so long in the habit of being a widow, and she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, that she had become a widow in her own mind.

She had been so long in the habit of being a widow, and she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, that she had become a widow in her own mind.

She had been so long in the habit of being a widow, and she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, that she had become a widow in her own mind.

She had been so long in the habit of being a widow, and she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, that she had become a widow in her own mind.

She had been so long in the habit of being a widow, and she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, that she had become a widow in her own mind.

She had been so long in the habit of being a widow, and she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, that she had become a widow in her own mind.

She had been so long in the habit of being a widow, and she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, that she had become a widow in her own mind.

She had been so long in the habit of being a widow, and she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, that she had become a widow in her own mind.

She had been so long in the habit of being a widow, and she had been so long in the habit of being a widow, that she had become a widow in her own mind.

EMPLOYMENT OF THE PEOPLE IN RUSSIA.

The riches of the Russian gentleman lie in the labour of his serfs, which it is his study to turn to good account; and he is more urged to this, since the law which compels the peasant to work for him, requires him to maintain the peasant; for the latter is found begging, the former is liable to a fine. He is therefore a master who must always keep a certain number of workmen, whether they are useful or not; and as every kind of agricultural and out-door employment is at a stand still during the winter, he naturally turns to the establishment of a manufactory as a means of employing his serfs in the winter.

In some cases the manufactory is at work only during the winter, and the people are employed in the summer in agriculture; though beyond what is necessary for home consumption, this is but an unprofitable trade in most parts of the empire, from the badness of the roads, the paucity and distance of markets, and the consequent difficulty of selling produce.

The alternate employment of the same men in the field and in the factory, which would be attempted in most countries with little success, is here rendered practicable and easy by the versatile genius of the Russian peasant, one of whose leading characteristics is a general capability of turning his hand to any kind of work which he may be required to undertake.

He will plough to-day, weave to-morrow, help to build a house the third day, and the fourth, if his master needs an extra coachman, he will mount the box and drive four horses abreast as though it were his own; and he is so well adapted to these various operations, except that he will not be performed, as in a country where the division of labour is more thoroughly understood.

He will, however, be sufficient well to do to serve the turn—a favourite phrase in Russia. These people are a very ingenious race, but perseverance is wanting; and though they will carry many arts to a high degree of excellence, they will not stop short of the point of perfection, and it will be long before their manufactures can rival the finish and durability of the English goods.—Dr. Clarke.

THE OUTSIDE PASSENGER.—Some years ago, a young lady who was going into a northern country, took a seat in a stage coach. For many miles she rode alone, and she was not long enough to smother her in the scenery through which she passed, and in the pleasing anticipations that occurred in her mind, she was not long enough to smother her in the scenery through which she passed, and in the pleasing anticipations that occurred in her mind.

At length the stage stopped at an inn, at which dinner was provided, and she alighted and sat down at the table. An elderly man followed and sat down also. The young lady rose, rang the bell, and ordered a glass of wine, and she was not long enough to smother her in the scenery through which she passed, and in the pleasing anticipations that occurred in her mind.
