The Maiden's Choice

OR, THE LAIRD OF BIRKENLEUCH.

A Tale of the Covenanters.

CHAPTER XIV.—WALTER AND MARION IN THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH.

On a clear, cold December day, about two weeks after the long night-ride of Walter and Marion from Birkenleuch to Elberton, the wide space in the Grassmarket of Edinburgh was densely packed by the spectators who had assembled to look upon the execution of Hugh McKail. Hugh, who with so many more had been concerned in the insurrection, had been taken prisoner on the Braids Hills, and, having been first examined under torture, was afterwards tried and condemned to death.

The day had now come on which he was to suffer, and his fate having produced an immense amount of pity and commiseration, the people had flocked in thousands to the Grassmarket to witness his noble end.

Walter Elliot was in the throng carefully disguised, for his fate would be the same if taken, and for the sake of those he loved, as well as for his own, he had no wish to give up his life in sacrifice. It was highly dangerous even for him to come there, but he yearned to look once more on the face of his friend, and hear the last words he was to utter on earth. Marion, with Hugh's mother, had paid a visit to the prison the previous evening, and taken the last sorrowful farewell; but, as it was impossible for Walter to obtain the same sad gratification, he resolved to mingle with the crowd at the place of execution, and Hugh having been informed of his intention, sent him a message, directing him to take up a position near the scaffold on his right hand, for there his eye would search him, and the friends would exchange the last glance of love and holy affection.

Accordingly Walter had succeeded in posting himself on steps at the mouth of a close, not many yards from the fatal ladder, and waited in the bitterness of grief for the melancholy tragedy to be enacted.

In due time the procession arrived, and Hugh appeared on the dismal elevation with a calm, composed mien and radiant countenance. No fear of death blanched his cheek or made his glance tremble. The conviction that he was about to suffer for the truth sustained him in that awful hour, and even raised him into rapture and ecstasy. Slowly his eye wandered over the crowd, and when it lighted on Walter, he bestowed on his friend a glance of deep, undying affection, and laid his hand on his bosom, which was the signal agreed on. That solemn signal Walter returned, and bowed his head in bursting emotion. When he looked up again Hugh was delivering his testimony to the multitude, and after speaking for a considerable time, he closed with his ever memorable farewell to earth and time, and welcome to heaven, eternity, and death. The celestial beauty which shone upon his face as he uttered his last words neither pen nor pencil can depict, but scarcely had the rich clear voice become silent when the executioner prepared to do his terrible office. Walter remained to see no more. Resolutely he turned his face away from the scaffold, but ere he had reached the crowd his elevation, the wall which broke from the crowd told him that the deed was done, and that Hugh was struggling through the dark portals of death, on his way to receive the martyr's crown.

With throbbing bosom, and a heart nearly bursting with anguish, the youth rushed up the close, and took his way to an obscure Court in the Canonry, to the house of a faithful friend there, where Marion and Mrs. McKail waited for the bitter news he was to bring.

So vehement and absorbing was his grief as he traversed the streets, that all caution and prudence on his own account were forgotten, and he did not notice that a man was behind him dogging his footsteps. The man kept on his track all down the High Street, he even crept after him into the Court in the Canonry—followed him noiselessly up the turnpike stair, and put a mark on the door of the house in which he entered.

This was Cringan, the spy. He was working again in the pay of Charlie Allan; and as he retraced his steps up the Canonry, he rubbed his hands together in gleeful satisfaction, for he knew the information he was now able to give his employer was such that the latter would well reward. And as Charlie was in the town, and residing in lodgings at no great distance, he would sell his information, and receive the price in a few minutes.

Little recked Walter of the danger that threatened, as he and Marion, with the mother that was now childless, sat together mourning the loss of Hugh. Say not that his glorious end made his death less a bereavement. The nobler and better that a life is, it is the more valuable to those within the sphere of its loving ministrations; and its loss is therefore all the heavier and greater. The relatives of Hugh McKail found it out, and were cast into the lowest depths of affliction.

Suddenly the door opened, and Marion uttered a scream when she looked up and saw Charlie Allan standing within the room. Walter sprang to his feet, and grief in his bosom gave place to wrath, when his eye fell on the form of his enemy.

"Discovered," he exclaimed, "and by you! What is your purpose?"

"Do you require to ask that?" returned Allan, and the old expression of fiendish triumph was on his face.

"You will spare Walter," exclaimed Marion, clasping her hands beseechingly. "He spared you, and you promised to protect him."

"A man will promise a deal with a dagger at his throat," answered Allan, with a mocking laugh. "Think you I will forgive the trick played on me at Birkenleuch? You have baffled me more than once, but I have you fast and sure at last, and the ladder at the Grassmarket will rid me of your enemy for ever."

"Money!" shrieked Marion, distractedly.—"At my entreaty he spared your life,—you not also spare his? Here on my knees!"

"Not so, Marion," said Walter hastily, as he caught her in his arms when she was about to throw herself at Allan's feet. "Do not increase his triumph by useless humiliation."

"No, no, not useless," she wildly cried. "He cannot refuse my prayer. Oh, Charlie, be pitiful, be just, redeem your promise, and return life for life!"

"He does not ask his life from me," rejoined Allan, in a cold tone.

"Ask it, Walter, ask it," she pleaded. "For my sake, ask it!"

"He looked with a troubled eye upon her streaming face. For your sake I will," he slowly replied. Then turning with a lofty dignity to Allan, he said—

"Charlie, my death can be of no advantage to you. Birkenleuch is yours. Be satisfied with that; and, for the sake of this poor girl, suffer me to carry out the intention we had formed to quit Scotland, and reside in a foreign land."

"You ask me for your life, then?" cried Charlie eagerly.

"I do."

"At last, then," he burst out, "at last I have humbled you, and my triumph is complete.—You have asked from me your life, and I refuse it!"

TO BE CONTINUED.

The first jail in Dayton was rather too deep for thieves to dig out of. It was an old well, an excavation, which had been dug to get water, and was so deep that it was only deep, but wide and shallow, the dirt into this pit the Sheriff let down the dirt, and the breakers of the peace, and water him until brought up for Military Changes.

The Toronto Globe has important information confirmatory or contradictory of the various rumors abroad, concerning contemplated military movements in the spring. It states that the changes this year will be principally among the infantry regiments serving in Canada; the changes among the artillery having taken place last year, it is not thought probable that any will take place for the next year or nine months at least. Regarding the infantry battalions, speculation is rife with anticipated changes. Pending the ultimate decision of the Imperial Government for the next year, it is almost certain that the 17th regt. at present here, will remove to London. The outlying companies of the regiment at Cobourg and other points, will be concentrated with headquarters, on the removal to London taking place. The 4th battalion of the 60th Rifles at present stationed at London, will at the same time remove to Point Lewis, where they will be engaged on the fortifications. A regiment at present in Quebec will remove to Montreal to replace the 87th Highlanders, who are expected to occupy the place of the 17th in the garrison here. The last named change is not, however, as certain as that determining the removal of the 17th to London. The cavalry will remain at present stationed, no changes being contemplated in the quartering of this section of our garrison; in fact, from the difficulty in obtaining barrack room elsewhere, it is a certain matter that they will remain as at present stationed until recalled from the country. No change of troops is contemplated as far as Hamilton and Brantford, the two remaining posts in this district, are concerned; and the movement in the former place, to secure permanent barracks, is taken in military circles as a guarantee that "the ambitious city" will have troops as long as any remain in the district. No authority exists for the rumor that a company of Royal Engineers is about to proceed to London.

TUNNELING NIAGARA RIVER.—The project of excavating a tunnel under Niagara River between Fort Erie and Buffalo is again revived, with promise that the work will be commenced at an early day. The Buffalo Courier states that the enterprise is in the hands of capitalists and practical men, both in Canada and in New York State, and is likely to result in its construction.

The last novelty in the newspaper world (says the South London [English] Press) is a "daily," to be called the Commercial Union. It proposes to insert, free of charge, advertisements of reputable shopkeepers, being paid by the latter a commission on the amount of purchases by readers, who will receive from sellers checks on the co-operative system entitling them to a share in the distribution of a reserve commission by lottery. Loans, free of interest, to struggling tradesmen are also proposed, a percentage on their sales being only demanded. The idea is French, and its practical first trial will be in Whitechapel.

A new sect, known as Nazarenes, has appeared in Hungary. It attracts the entire peasant population, as the Methodists did in Wales. It is only among the lower classes that it spreads with rapidity. The people have no priests and no religious rites. They refuse to have their children baptised and will swear no oath. They have closely connected societies, in which all matters of common interest and the private affairs of individuals are arranged. They are quiet, orderly, sober and industrious above their neighbours. No one seems to know where the religion came from, nor how it was introduced, but it is sweeping over the land like a
