

DOHERTY SAYS DEFEAT DUE TO POOR ORGANIZATION

WORKDAY IN NEW PARADISE IS CUT DOWN TO 2 HOURS

Albert J. Moore, Head of Chicago Culk, Outlines His Plans.

TO LIMIT RICHES

By S. ARMOUR MACAULAY

Special to The Advertiser.

Harvard, Ill. June 25.—Six miles east of here, over the roughest road in McHenry county, Illinois, is heaven.

Albert J. Moore, head of the Life Institute of Chicago, and recent leader of a "love cult," in that city, is the founder of "heaven." He has acquired what is known as the "old Murphy farm," and for the paradise has enlisted the help of making a paradise out of a few acres of land.

Two-hour working day is the ultimate object of "heaven," but the members of the colony are working from 12 to 14 hours a day to make this possible.

The Murphy farm is 800 feet above sea level which is about as close to the sky as one can get in McHenry county and Moore, the master of "heaven," has already admitted 34 persons into the sacred precincts. The writer visited "heaven," today in an automobile, piloted by a chauffeur who struck every bump in the rough road leading to it. Every time a bump met the chauffeur would condemn the vagaries of the highway with an expressive "damn."

Opens To Select Groups

The last few hundred yards were made up of a series of bumps, and consequently we rose into "heaven," on a sonata of expletives on the part of the driver. He pulled up the car with a grinding of the brakes, turned and said: "Hell were here, and said: "Where," asked the correspondent, was the stopping place was an ordinary farm-yard.

"Heaven," said the driver.

"One of Moore's assistants said "heaven" was founded so that "we can have whatever we want," but the master, in his private office gave this version:

"Three classifications of people will be admitted here. Of course we will open arms to everybody, only we will not accept those who are not members of the full member."

The guest may stay as long as he likes, as at a country hotel. When he leaves he must leave a donation. The fee member comes for life only. He stays or leaves any time at his option. He may make a donation when he leaves. The full member is the real stay of the sacred colony. When he leaves he legally binds himself to the colony forever, body, soul and spirit, and agrees as to life members, by all regulations. A rich person may enter "heaven." Only persons owning $50,000 or less may enter.

Sets a Maximum Amount

Moore declared that three million dollars—a New York bank, and the Chicago man—had already sought admission. Moore said he told them they would be admitted if they brought only $100,000. "Dispose of everything you have and turn the surplus back to the colony," he said. "Men are still considering the matter."

When a man enters "heaven," he takes the work he likes best. A man who likes to be a blacksmith, now is busy in his anvil. In a few weeks a former healthy New Yorker will take charge of 4,000 chickens, because he always wanted to be a poultry breeder.

"Heaven" will be on its feet finally in four years if Moore's plan works. Directors of "heaven" are Moore, Mrs. S. P. Talcott, Harold Kent, Major G. S. Adams and Corda, all of Chicago.

ARMER IS SENTENCED FOR TRAFFIC IN BEER

Frank C. Reed Fined $1,000, With Jail Option, Following Raid.

Special to The Advertiser.

Brantford, June 26.—Pleading guilty to having beer for sale, a fine of $1,000 and costs, or six months in jail, was the sentence imposed by Magistrate Blake on Frank C. Reed, farmer residing on the Burford road, six miles west of Brantford, who was charged with selling beer.

The police have had Reed's farm under surveillance for some time past, it is understood, and about 11 o'clock on Saturday night Provincial Officer Ned Baugh and members of the local force made a raid and seized thirteen bags and five cartons of bottled refreshments, containing a rough estimate about 650 bottles.

HAYING HAS COMMENCED IN ONTARIO DISTRICTS

Canadian Press Despatch.

Toronto, June 26.—Haying has begun in many districts and the flowers of last week greatly refreshed the pastures, says the report of the Ontario Department of Agriculture. Fall wheat is heading early, but the straw is rather short and a rule. Spring grains are coming long in fine condition, but need more rain. Farm labor is scarce, and undressed could easily be placed.

MAKE ARRANGEMENTS FOR FISHER'S GLEN CAMP

Special to The Advertiser.

Brantford, June 26.—Captain W. H. H. of Woodstock, general secretary of the Y. M. C. A., there, was in the city yesterday conferring with A. Buchanan concerning the Fisher's Glen camp for Western Ontario boys.

He is going to the Glen with the ad hoc party tomorrow. Kitchener, Elph, Stratford, Woodstock, Galt, Brantford, Hamilton and St. Catharines have reported that a large number will come from these centers.

Doherty Attributes U.F.O. Defeat To Party's Lack of Proper Organization

Minister of Agriculture In Drury Government Gives Interview To The Advertiser—Declares He Will Continue His Work For Co-operative Marketing.

"Had we gone to the country last October we could have carried the province. Of that I am quite sure." Such is the opinion of Hon. Manning Doherty, one of the three cabinet ministers in the Drury government, given to The Advertiser at an early hour this morning. Hon. Mr. Doherty motored here from his riding in East Kent, where he has been spending the last few days.

"What defeated the U.F.O.?" answered Mr. Doherty in reply to The Advertiser's question. "Well, that would take a lot of explaining, but it is a fact that lack of organization had much to do with it. As you know, we as an organization have always stood for the complete autonomy of each individual unit in the organization. Each one runs its own affairs, selects its own executive and conducts its own election. We have relied entirely on the creation of public opinion in this way in order to get our political success. The election just closed leads me to believe that the old-time political organization and its methods are not effective when it comes to conducting a province-wide campaign. They all help to create an atmosphere of centralized enthusiasm, but this is a great effect on getting out the vote and getting a big organization to work together for political purposes. I feel that there were many votes in my own riding that I did not get for that reason. Out of the five weeks of the campaign I was away from there for three weeks, and that all tended to leave the field open to others."

"What is your own idea of the future?" queried The Advertiser. "Do you intend to go to the legislature as a private member in opposition?"

"Well, that is something to which I have had no time to give much thought," was his answer. "There are a number of plans that we had under way that I would like to see the government go on with, and I would be inclined to work with them if they cared to go on with them. The great thing of these was the plan for co-operative marketing. It was all in shape when I left the government. I heard that there was an election coming off I gave orders to cancel the arrangements for the time being, because I did not want to see the match-

ter of co-operative marketing made a political issue. It would have been the worst thing that could have happened to it. As you, no doubt, know I was one of the men who tried to keep the U.F.O. from going into politics in the first place, and I am more convinced than ever that I was right in this contention. The economic problem of the farmer is far greater than his political problem. When the farmers went into politics they weakened their position as businessmen because they were divided on political lines. I would like very much to go ahead with the co-operative marketing, and I intend to go ahead with it regardless of politics. We have all the machinery ready now and contracts signed. It will include fruit, tobacco, beans, honey and the products of the dairies of the province. I hope the agriculturists of the province see that their best interest lies in coming together as businessmen and not as politicians. I am more firmly convinced than ever that if they do this it will be the biggest step in advance that agriculture in Ontario can take."

Hon. Mr. Doherty said that more than anything else he regretted the defeat of Mr. Drury, describing him as a man of great ability and a true public life. I have known him for years. Why, come to think of it I laugh him at so many U.F.O. seats to the Conservative side, stated that the task of doing that was too great, especially on the night of an election, when he had no explanation of the landslide.

"Had the road policy of the government?"

"To some extent it had," answered Mr. Doherty. "There were some things which he felt that the road-building scheme was in advance of the times, and they were afraid that it would place too great a burden on them. Of course in any such political upheaval there must be many causes. Mr. Doherty, in response to the suggestion that he explain the defection of so many U.F.O. seats to the Conservative side, stated that the task of doing that was too great, especially on the night of an election, when he had no explanation of the landslide.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

FINLAY McDIARMID

Conservative candidate in West Elgin, another of the winners in yesterday's Conservative victory.

HARDING SUPPORTS U.S. PROHIBITION LAW

President Appeals To People of Nation To Discontinue Use of Intoxicants.

Special to The Advertiser.

Denver, Colo., June 25.—President Harding today appealed to the American people to stop drinking intoxicating liquors, and the president went further than he has ever gone in any prohibition speech, arguing that there are literally American millions who resent the lawless practices of a few, and rebel against the denial to the vast majority.

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."

Mr. Harding made himself a 100 per cent "dry" advocate, politically and otherwise, in his former address at Denver, and while he did not mention Governor Smith of New York by name, he made it very plain he thought the recent appeal of the Muller-Gage law was likely to prove one of the historic blunders of political management.

There is no doubt after the president finished speaking that he is absolutely convinced the 18th amendment will never be repealed, that neither political party would dare advocate repeal, and that whatever changes are made some day in the Volstead act "will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement, rather than moderation of the general policy."