"No, I couldn't," retorted Mabin, with of it? And was it not rather the act great fierceness, but with a twinkle of fun in her gray eyes, which gave greater hopes than her words did. "It is of no use for me to promise more than I can perform. You had much better look upon me as a decidely disagreeable person, with rare moments of proper behavior."

There were three large windows, two on the right hand, and one at the end of the room in front of her. Above the shutters of those on her right the gray rays of the morning were creeping, making the marble of the heavy old mantelpiece look livid, and showing the stains of damp on the white and gold walipaper.

This was all that the girl had time to notice, when suddenly the shutters of the window at the end of the room were thrown back with a clatter of wood and a clank of iron, and she saw the green of the trees outside, and the man of whom she was in pursuit standing in the opening he had made. And then she saw that the French window was open, and knew that this was the way by which he had entered the house.

The word "Stop!" was on her lips, when suddenly he seemed to stagger, and she heard him gasp and struggle for his breath. Surely this was no burglar, this man with the thin white hands, who could not run a hundred yards without inconvenience.

Running lightly and quickly to the window, she looked out into the garden. The fresh breeze blew the open semblance to the man she had seen a to the police at present. window against the wooden shutter quarter of an hour before escaping Friday evening fire was discovered ment she caught sight of the figure of light of the dawn Mabin saw his face distinctly.

In a moment the last trace of fear of him which had lingered in her heart disappeared. Almost as pale as a mask of the dead, the face she saw was that of a man on whom every form of suffering seemed to have left its mark. The hollow eyes were full of unspeakable sadness; the deep lines about the mouth were those of illness or sorrow rather than of age; while even the thick sprinkling of gray hairs among the brown, which Mabin detected in the searching cold light of the morning, told the same tale of weight of grief rather than of years.

All these things the girl's quick young eyes saw in one brief look. Then, instinctively, she took a step forward into the garden, with some vague intention of asking him a question. But the moment she moved he turned, and, disappearing from her sight behind the trees and shrubs which grew between | made her start and turn round. the lawn and the spot where she stood, left her in a state of surprise and bewilderment from which it took her lying, prone, motionless, on the floor. some minutes to recover.

Uneasy, interested, puzzled, Mabin went slowly upstairs, started violently when the tall clock on the stair struck 4 close to her ear, and stood before the open door of the room through which the intruder had passed on his way to and from hers.

Who was this man with the grave, sad, handsome face who got into the house by night, and stole his way to the very bedchamber of Mrs. Dale? In what relation did he stand to the lovely widow !

No honest man, whether relation, friend or lover, would pay mysterious visits like these! And yet there was something in his face so attractive, so

This seemed probable, and at any rate this could be easily ascertained. If so, and if "Mr. Banks" was a madman, why was he unattended by any keeper? And what "Mr. Banks," or no "Mr. Banks," was the meaning of these stealthy, nocturnal visits? That they were so unexpected, so unwelcome, as to be inconceivable on the part of Mrs. Dale, had been abundantly proved by the fact that she had believed the visitor to be a vision of her imagination only, and not a human being. For Mabin could not doubt that the appearance which Mrs. Dale had taken or a horrible dream had been in reality the living man she had just seen. Who then could he be? And what could he want? Was the refined, sensitive face, with its sad eyes and worn mouth, the mask and not the index of the man?

The more Mabin thought, the clearer it seemed to grow to her that the man was either a relation or a lover, who had gone out of his mind, and whose the old country. This is a new ininsanity had taken this strange form dustry. of nocturnal persecution. But then, again, if he had been in-

Mabin decided that this question must be answered definitely before she could think herself on the road to the discovery of the mystery.

In the meantime, the door of the room through which she had passed in pursuit of the intruder being still open, she entered, instinctively looked round to see if he had left any trace of his presence. She drew up the blind and let the daylight stream into the corners.

The room was like the rest of the house, shabby and furnished with little taste. It had perhaps been a study, or a school room, for in front of one of the windows there was a large leathercovered writing-table, much splashed with ink. The rest of the furniture consisted of a couple of small 6.comans and half a dozen chairs, all covered with green repp, and trimmed with green worsted fringe, and of a mahogany bookcase which stood near the

But as her fascinated eyes pored over the painting, studying each feature, it grew upon her gradually that the likeness between it and the man was that of a face in happiness to a face in sorrow, and she saw the possibility that they were one and the same person.

As this thought crossed her mind she stepped back, startled by her own discovery. The light, growing stronger every moment, began to bathe the picture in the brightness of a summer morning, and she noticed then with what care it had been preserved. A tiny rod ran along the top of the picture, and from it hung two curtains, now drawn aside, of dark blue satin, hung with bullion fringe, and embroidered richly in shades of blue and gold. Mabin's eyes, attracted by the beautiful colors, were fixed upon this handsome hanging, when a piercing cry, uttered by a voice she did not recognize, for a really healthy man to be good humored. Jollity and exhuberant health are a proverbial combination. The hearty man who is always laughing doesn't have any trouble with his digestion. It has been said that laughing makes people healthy. The truth is that health makes people laugh.

It is impossible to estimate the tremendous influence of health upon human character. A man with a headache will not be in a happy, contented frame of mind. A man who suffers from a weak stomach and an impaired digestion will sit and grumble through the best meal ever prepared. A bilious man who is not a bore, is deserving of a place in a museum. A nervous man who is not petulent and fault-finding is a curiosity. All these conditions lead to grave diseases, when the victim becomes not only disagreeable, but dependent as well. A wise wife will realize that while the old saying that a "man's heart is in his stomach," is not literally true, it is a fact that his stomach sweetens or sours his character according as it is healthy or unhealthy. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is the best of medicines for the conditions described. It makes the weak stomach strong, the impaired digestion perfect, invigorates the liver, purifies and enriches the blood and tones the nerves. It tears down half-dead, inert tissues and replaces them with the firm muscular tissues of health. It builds new and healthy nerve fibres and brain cells. It dissipates nervousness and melancholy and imparts mental elasticity and courage.

It is the best of all known medicines for nervous disorders. nervous disorders.

London, April 25.—Mr. Rhodes is now seeking an Imperial Government guarantee of £2,000,000 sterling. Mr. Rhodes said on Thursday: "With a railway to Tanganyika, Uganda occupied, and Kitchener marching from Khartoum, the whole of Africa is assured to us. This is no dream." "But," says Mr. Rhodes' critics, "what about the map of Africa? Supposing that he had arranged to annex considerable patches on the west and north not at present British, how is he going to meet Gen. Kitchener coming down from Khartoum? Will the railway, supposing it gets up to Tanganyika, proceed by way of Congo territory, or through German East Africa?" How absurd it is, they add, to suppose, after the kaiser's faus message of congratulation to Kruger after the Jameson raid, that Germany will agree to any such thing. Yet that is just what Mr. Rhodes intends, and he has a peculiar knack of getting what he wants. He has devoted his life to painting the bold red line of British paramountey from Cairo to the Cape, and unless he has altogether under-estimated the forces against him, he will paint it far sooner than at this moment looks possible.
