Choice Between Science and Suffering. Sir John Lubbock, in the Contemporary Review,)

The most important secrets of nature are sten hidden away in most unexpected places. Many valuable substances have been discovered in the refuse of manufactories; it was a happy shought of Glauber to examine what verybody else threw away. There is perhaps no nation the future happiness and prosperity of which depend more on science than our own. Our population is over $5,00,000, and, is rabidly increasing. Even at present it is far larger than our acreage can support. Few people whose business does not lie in the study of statistics realize that we have to pay foreign countries no less than $140,000,000 a year for food. This, of course, we purchase mainly by manufactured articles. We hear now a great deal about depression of irade, and foreign, especially American competition, which, let me observe, will be much reemer a few years hence, when she has paid off her debt, and consequently has refuced her taxation. But let us look forward 100 years—no long time in the isory of a nation. Our coal supplies will then be nearly exhausted. The population of Great Britain doubles at the present rate of increase in shout 50 years, so that we sheal then, if the present rate continues, require to import over $400,000,000 a year in food. How, hen, is this to be paid for? We have before as, as usual, three courses. The Duc d'Aumale created a great sensation among his relatives the other day when he married his children's gouvernante, the Combesse de Clinchant. It was a morganatic marriage, but that was only to satisfy the prejudices of his people, as there is little prosping of any issue from the connection. The louchesse was the widow of a soldier of g. d family, but not noble. Her husband was it ed and left her penniless, and then she because the companion of Mme. la Duchesse d'Aumale—a sort of first lady of the bedchamber. When the Queen of Sicily visited ber daughter she ennobled the gouvernante, as the did not wish her daughter's companion to be a commoner. After the Duchesse's death Mme. de Clinchant became a second mother to her children, and they regarded her with tender affection. She was at the head of the household, and though the due was a bon viver, she was regarded by him and every one slew with profound respect and admiration. The due lost all his children, one after the bether, and then he married the woman who had been so near and dear to them. She is nearly 50 years old, and was never pretty, but are sweetness and goodness is such that no me can resist the charm of her noble countenance and gentle manners. Going into exile the did was not willing to separate from her, and though his family are somewhat horrified at its alliance with a woman of no birth, there will probably be small opposition to it.
