IS CANADA DIFFERENT?

The utter abhorrence with which all classes in Britain irrespective of party, regard the possibility of an election during the war, is strikingly illustrated by the reports in British papers just received in Canada of the recent debate on the extension of Parliament. In introducing the extension measure, Mr. Bonar Law gave utterance to words which, it seems to us, should be given the widest possible publicity in this country. He said:

"The considerations which have induced successive Governments to introduce such a bill are as strong now as they have ever been during the war. We are now in as critical a phase of the war as we have ever been in. Our troops are engaged in the greatest operations they have ever undertaken since the commencement of the war. . . . In these circumstances I cannot help feeling that, as on previous occasions, the Government and the House believe that it would be highly disadvantageous, not to put it more strongly, that we should be plunged into the turmoil of a general election with all the disputes and divisions which such an election would inevitably produce, and with, in addition the certainty that the nation would be diverted from the one object on which its efforts should be concentrated."

Mr. Law was followed by ex-Premier Asquith, now on the Opposition benches, who, after dwelling on the fact that the bulk of British electors are in the trenches, went on to say:

"Voters fighting in various theatres of the war would not be able to record their votes. An election under these conditions would not be an election at all. It would be a farce and a sham, and, nobody would regard the House so chosen as possessing in any real sense the moral authority either for legislation or criticism of administration. To take a course which would necessitate the holding of an election under such circumstances would be to fly in the face of common law common fairness and common sense."

The powerful reasons urged by the two great British leaders against an election in the Old Land apply with equal force to Canada. Indeed, there is only too much reason to expect that the "disputes and divisions" which Mr. Bonar Law associates with an election in Britain would be a much more serious matter for us here in Canada. The truth is, no matter how unpalatable and regrettable it may be, that an election in Canada tomorrow would inevitably tend toward a widening of racial gulfs already far too broad, and would likely fan into renewed life smouldering issues which most of us would like to see dead forever. No Canadian, no matter what his politics, who is bending a British heart to the war, can contemplate such a possibility without misgivings. We went into this war with high hopes, with united purpose and determined resolve. Let us not lightly take a step which might result in the weakening of our determination and the curtailment of our efforts. Let us not follow a course which is rejected by the Motherland as a distraction from the war. Let us not do that which would divert our efforts from the one object upon which they should be concentrated
