What took you away so unceremoniously? King Cole was sent home, and he expected you later. When you did not come, you cannot imagine how anxious your cousin and I were. But now that you have returned, it is all right, not be here to-morrow for dinner, I only you should not give us such a fright again.'

'You did not get your telegram from New York, then?'

'Yes, but not until the next day. What took you away so suddenly?' 'Important business sir.'

'Well, now that we have you w shall keep you.'

'You are exceedingly kind, I had hoped to remain longer, but upon my return to New York I found an old friend who was most hospitable to me while I was abroad. He brings letters, of course, by the score, but he is not i much of a society man, so that he dreads to present them, on account of all that he knows he must undergo. In fact, I found him incognito, in order that he might get a few days' rest.
