Wah Sing Passes.

Famous British Columbia Chinaman
Goes to Join His Fathers.

The Province of British Columbia, though it is one of the newest settlements on the earth, is mellow with historic places, and her story is replete with fascinating romance and tragedy. Every village has a trail of years crammed with incident. The land is full of wild tales of the grim early days when the people of the province counted themselves in dozens and the natural enemies of the pioneer, the Indian and the wilderness, were very real and near. Into the names of her civic centres, into the rivers and lakes and mountain she has woven a commemorations of her time of travail. To the newcomers, the "Chechakos," the quaint musical names of British Columbia mean nothing except a troubled pronunciation. To the old-timer they are fraught with memories, some happy, even as the Long Sault of the Ottawa, or the Lost Channel of the St. Lawrence, or the Plains of Abraham have historic significance to the easterner. The difference, however, lies in the fact there are many long-bearded, taciturn old-timers still alive who remember intimately all the gold rushes of the early days which first attracted the eyes of the world to this far away land.

Among the names which history has given on the tablets of British Columbia is that of Wah Sing. In this vast new land, where the melting-pot of nations forever seethes and boils, there is nothing extraordinary in the name of a Chinaman linked with the cosmopolitan horde which makes up the motley of people herding in this quarter of the globe. The name of Wah Sing for nearly forty years has allied with the gold activities of the famous Tulameen district. At the age of 110 years he stretched out his withered yellow frame and died in the little log house where he had lived ever since the gold rush of '85. Itinerant Chinese gathered silently from remote parts of the valley. They lighted the little red tapers at head and feet, placed a bottle and two cups on the grave, and then the inscrutable mourners dispersed and left the tiny mound of Wah Sing to level itself on the gigantic slope of the mountain face. The grass has not yet pushed a green blade through the raw soil, for the grave is not old.

"Only a chinaman," you say. Just so, but the life story of Wah Sing, the little market-gardner of Granite Creek, is filled with the glittering romance of the China Seas; it is clothed in a barbaric splendor peculiar to the East; it echoes to the swift thunder of sea battles. For those lowly-burning candles gutter by the barren of a Chinese viking, they flash the inadequate signal of the death of an Eastern sea-king. Once upon a time this Wah Sing stood upon the rocking deck of his own ship. He flung his arduous taunt at the crusted cogles of the Dragon Throne, took heavy toll of the commerce of the seas and sent his fleet way with a treasure-packed bull. Wah Sing was a buccaneer, a Chinese Morgan, with a war junk of his own and a murderous crew, who bent their evil wills to none but his. What ships he robbed and foundered off the China coast, what men he slew, what desperate ventures he led, he alone knew, and now no one will ever know, for Wah Sing was the last of his pirate crew. If you read the log of H. M. S. Terror of fifty years ago you will learn of the sinking of Wah Sing's junk. It will tell how the crafty pirate escaped ashore and how his men were taken in irons to Honk Kong and hanged.

So here, in the last west, came Wah Sing to live the balance of a life already old. Through the moulding period of the bad days of the west he pushed his unobtrusive way, a miner and latterly a market-gardner of the Tulameen. Educated far beyond the humble knowledge which is the lot of the ordinary Chinese, Wah Sing was known as "Franchy," because he spoke that tongue. In fact he had been known to use the language of five peoples—English, French, German, Chinook and Siwash, in addition to his native tongue.
