In The House.

The outline of His Daily Day Described by a Member of Parliament.

St. Stephen's has been declared to be the most entertaining place on earth—the best club in the world. On the other hand, many members of Parliament say that the life is so exacting as to be practically intolerable to a man who has other business to which to attend. Still, it has many compensations—besides that distinction.

The late Dr. Robert Wallace, the once popular member for East Edinburgh, used to say that, although the work was exacting to those who desired to get any recognition, it was amply repaid in the end.

That is the opinion most generally expressed by those who have sat on the green benches and responded cheerfully and loyally to the summons of the party whip.

Of course, there is an everyday routine through which all members must go through if they are to discharge their duties to their constituents; and no one can expect to carry on his business at the same time. Yet that is what a great many hon. gentlemen attempt to do.

But is only the strong man and arduous worker who can do this without detriment to himself. For, after all, mere attendance at the House for eight or ten hours, or perhaps longer, without a break involves a considerable strain on one when the same performance is repeated day after day through a long and arduous session.

Perhaps the heaviest part of the duties of a member of Parliament is the work he has to do in committee. Day by day, especially in the earlier part of the session, there are committees sitting in several rooms at St. Stephen's examining private bills, while public bills are examined by what are known as Grand or Standing Committees.

There are also select Committees for specific purposes, and the numbers composing these, as a rule, consist of fifteen members. Under a standing order, Select Committees can sit during the sitting of the House except while it is at prayers.

It is amazing to find how M.P.'s are inundated with letters, not only from their constituents, but from people of whose existence they know nothing.

Of course, attention must be given to those communications, and the number of hours that members spend in the writing-rooms can be gauged by the number of letters that are posted and delivered at the House, and also the amount spent on postage stamps.

Some M.P.'s open their mailbags with something like fear and trembling, but wealthy representatives make light of their bulky correspondence. They keep private secretaries, and, as being a member of Parliament is at once their occupation and hobby, they do not regard letter-writing as particularly irksome, or their correspondents as bores.

Having attended to their private correspondence, members have next to study the whips. Then the real work of the day begins. The duties of private members are, of course, by no means so onerous as those of Cabinet Ministers, and especially the Premier, who is expected to be in his place on the Treasury bench to lead debates, reply to questions, and attend generally to matters that may arise during the sitting.

Then the Prime Minister has to receive numerous deputations and listen to their grievances; he has also to interview his colleagues and attend to other calls that are made on his time and energy. Another important duty that used to devolve on the Premier, but which, it seems, is now to be discontinued, was to write a letter to the King every night when Parliament was sitting, giving a summary of the day's proceedings in the Commons. Nowadays, this duty is usually performed by one of his Cabinet colleagues.

It is the division lists, however, that bear the strongest evidence of the member of Parliament's devotion to duty, and it is to these that his constituents look.

It has become the practice in recent years for local newspapers, not only to publish the lists showing how many divisions the member for a particular district has taken part in, but to print details setting forth how he has voted for this or that particular bill.

Constituents are thus enabled to see whether their representative has been faithful to his promise, and to cautions him with confidence in regard to any measure in which he may have given a vote in opposition to their wishes.
