urned out of Brockton and took the road for home, "what a damnable thing it must be not to have any money and no way side terrace. to get any, no one willing to lend. Poor old Molly, no wonder she wanted to marry Hancock!"

All the way home he kept thinking of the girl and his wounded love. The circumstances all pointed to her guilt, and the last month had shaken his belief n her word He was sick with disgust at the whole affair and at the knowledge that he still cared for the girl, that he would not, could not, leave her behind. She had said she would marry him, and he knew that she meant it and that he would ask her to again, that he wanted her above everything and in spite of everything. All the way home he fought his love, knowing it would conquer him in the end. He told himself that she was the end. He told himself that she was an unscrupulous woman, that he had trusted her because her eyes were big and blue, and her hair was soft and curly and dark, clinging to her neck and temples in tiny ringlets. and that she had betrayed him.

Again he recalled that Sunday when she had wheedled his secret from him.

she had wheedled his secret from him. She felt that her time was drawing to a close and that the opportunity she had always longed for, to marry a rich man, which had come to her in this out-of-the way corner of the world, was slipping from her grasp, never to return, and in er desperation she had resorted to anything to get rid of the troublesome, Pat-terson without herself forbidding him the grounds and creating talk. He remembered that she had gone across the bay on Monday morning in her motor boat to Brockton. She had probably telegraphed on Monday morning in her motor boat to Brockton. She had probably telegraphed then. There was no one else who could have done so, no one else who knew about Patterson. He forgot about the broken boiler, and that Holmes had been traced through it, his hired chauffeur having telegraphed a confirmation of the law's demand if Holmes was not there. Yes, the circumstances were all against her, and yet he loved her, could feel still how soft her hands were as she had clung

Yes, that was probably why she ordered so many things. No, he couldn't when she was going. He just know given unofficially by M. Ribot is as say when she was going. He just know that he had been ordered to get the

that he had been ordered to get the things and so he was getting them. No, he didn't know if she expected Algernom up or not, supposed she did, but wasn't sure when. No. Hancock wasn't going with her, of course not. They weren't married. No, certainly not. They weren't going to get married, hadn't any ingoing to get married, hadn't any intentions of doing so.
"Someone was asking for you," said Higgins, standing aside as the last of the packages was stowed away and Algernon was cranking the car. "That so?" asked Algernon. "Who was it?"

"The constable," said Higgins cheerfully. "from Brockton."

Algernon flushed. "What did he want with me?" he asked nervously. He had hoped Patterson would be able to get away before the constable came.

"Don't know," said Higgins, thoroughly enjoying the situation. "He asked for a feller named Joseph Holmes, and we sent him up to the Crags." him up to the Crags."
"Thanks," drawled Algernon. "I'll go on up and find him."

Algermon did not stop at the house, but ran the car directly across the lawn to the steps in the cliffs that descended to the wharf. The sloop no longer coquetted with the dancing waves at her moorings some distance from the shore. They had brought her to the dock, a slim, staunch little craft, and while the gardener was washing down the decks. Bates, forward was getting the sails ready, whistling in shrill and happy discords. The sun shone warm and tenderly. The sea was as blue as the cloudless sky, and a little breeze ruffled the blankets and sheets of the abin that were airing on the roof. At the sound of the stopping car, Pat-terson emerged from the cabin door and strolled to the railing and down the deck o the wharf. He was cool and blase. his immaculate suit of pale gray and light blue silk accessories, tie, socks and hatband. He came languidly up to the car and peered at the bundles in the tonneau, waving his hand indifferently toward the

"The constable has already come," said Algernon nodded.

'I avoided him as much as possible, and ame on down here without attracting attention. Mr. Hancock and your friend James came over in the motor boat and James came over in the motor boat and are up there now. I think they have rather impressed the fellow, and Miss O'Toote has enlisted them to help her keep the constable for coming over to this side of the house and seeing what's oing on."

"Did he try to search the place?" The maid met him at the door "No. He said he wanted Joseph Holmes. She admitted that he worked there, but said that he had gone to Brockton on an er-rand for Mrs. Todd. He would be back shortly and the constable went in to wait. got out as soon as I could and came

"Send Bates up here," ordered Algernon. "We must get these things on the boat as soon as we can, so you can take advantage of this breeze. You can get away without going up to the house again. Bates knows as much about a boat as I do, and he and the gardener on.

But Bates was already half across the harf. He had always admired the chaufeur with an intense but shamed admiration, for he had never before thought it possible that he could have admired anypossible that he could have admired anyone with a shady past. That he did was cause for regret, and of doubt as to his own invulnerable moral worth. But since that morning, admiration was a mild word for the absolute adoration with which he now regarded Patterson.

"Bates, you and Patterson and I will get this stuff on board. Let the gardener attend to the sails. It doesn't matter whether things are exactly shipshape or whether things are exactly shipshape or not. You want to get away before this breeze falls off. Pity our motor boat sn't bigger.' "Aye, aye, sir," answered Bates in the prompt, snappy tones he imagine used safety lamp, which he can wear on his sailors on war vessels.

"Great guns!" he thought, as the car ings cast off and the little boat swing free and with her white sails spread start gracefully out to sea. Then he turned the car and ran back across the lawn to the

As he approached. Molly came out, followed by the constable and James and Hancock. Algernon brought the car up to the steps, and the girl went straight down to him. They met on the bottom pered, motioning backward with her head toward the men who had hesitated at the top of the steps.

"Come for me?" asked Algernon.

The girl nodded. "I thought you were going away on the boat. I kept him in going away on the boat. I kept him the drawing-room where he couldn't see the drawing room as long as I could. what was going on as long as I could. Why didn't you go. Joe?"

"I couldn't leave you, sweetheart. I am a thief, a forger, but your lover, Molly O'Toole. Will you have me?" He held out his hands, with eyes and thoughts for no one but the girl before him.

"Yes," said she simply, "for I love you, Joe."

She put her hands in his and he reised.

She put her hands in his and he raised them gently to his lips and kissed first one, then the other. He longed to take her in his arms, but no Todd ever forgot himself so in public as to make an exhibition of his deeper feelings. "Molly!" Hancock's voice was sharp with pain, and he started down the steps and then stopped one hand held out to the girl, but she did not notice it, and it

The constable turned to Hancock

"Yes, certainly."

The girl nodded. She felt that she could do more for Joe if she still conealed her identity from the constable The Todds had a great deal of influence. She might be able to get him out on bail quicker as Mrs. Todd than as Molly O'Toole, she reasoned, in her ignorance knowing little or nothing about bail. His claim to be Algernon Van Rensellear Todd was foolish, and she could not under-stand it. Todd had just left on the sloop Canada. Bored, as he had told her, waiting for his boiler to come, and having seen Bates busy with the sloop, the idea to go to Canada by water came to him and he decided to act upon it, though Molly, thinking for whom she intended the sloop, had tried to put him off. He had spent the morning with them, had met Hancock and James and the constable in the character of Todd, had been so introduced to them all. explainng his little masquerade as Patterson on

"You have known him as Joseph Holmes?" asked the constable "Yes," said the girl helplessly.
"He came to town about three weeks

"Yes, I think that is about right."
"From New York?"
"He said so." (To be continued.)

In ten minutes the provisions had been stored away, and Algernon climbed into the car and watched the sails of the little sloop flap strenuously as the gardener and Bates ran them up to catch the rapidly-freshening breeze. Algernon had interested to go himself, but how could he leave Molly behind without a word, without letting her know that he forgave her and wanted her back again? He watched the sail slowly rise and fill, the moorcap. The lamps are supplied with power
