The Day Beyond. When the youth is with us all things seem
But lightly to be wished and won;
We snare to-morrow in a dream
And take our toil for work undone:
"For life is long, and time a stream
That sleeps and sparkles in the sun—
What need of any haste?" we say;
"To-morrow's longer than to day."

And when to-morow shall destroy
The heaven of our dreams, in vain
Our burrying manhood we employ
To build the vanished bliss again;
We have no leisure to enjoy.
So few the years that yet remain;
So much to do, and, ah!" we say,
"To-morrow's shorter than to-day."

But when our hands are worn and weak, But when our hands are worn and w And still our labors seem unblest, And time goes past us like a bleak Last twilight waning to the west, "It is not here—the bliss we seek; Too brief is life for happy rest. And yet what need of grie!?" we say "To morrow's longer than to-day." -A. St. John Adcock, Chambers' Jour
