The fire is said to have been caused by the explosion of a lighted lamp, which Mr. Murdoch was carrying, while engaged in working around the building.

A two-storey building adjoining also caught fire and was practically destroyed, as was Mr. Murdoch's.

Neighbors formed themselves into a bucket brigade and assisted in keeping the fire from spreading to other and nearby houses, tho it was at one time feared that a number of them would go. The fire station on East Queenstreet was communicated with. There is no hydrant in Norway and nothing could be done along that line. The families in each of the burned houses had narow escapes. The fire loss on the two buildings will amount to probably $1500, but the amount of insurance, if any, could not be learned.
